Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following substitute for the motion to recommit, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute for the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRISP offered the following substitute for the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from New York, Mr. MILLS:

"That H. R. 6715, the bill now under consideration, be, and the same is hereby, recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back instanter with Title XII eliminated from the bill."

Mr. CRISP. And on that I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment as a substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by my colleague, Mr. ROUSE, who is unavoidably absent, to say that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GREEN of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BLACK of Texas (at the request of Mr. GARNER of Texas), for 10 days, on account of the death of his brother;

To Mr. BUCHANAN, for 10 days, on account of illness in his family; and

To Mr. REID of Illinois, for five days, on account of important business.

REVENUE ACT OF 1924.

Mr. BROWNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, when the tax-reduction plans were presented for public discussion and believing that tax reduction was a national and not a partisan issue I went to my district to find out the wishes of my constituency upon these plans. I invited suggestions and advice. I wrote many personal letters and published in the press an appeal for instruction. This appeal was as follows:

In the near future an opportunity will be given to the Members of the House of Representatives to vote upon a tax-reduction plan. Perhaps we shall have to choose between two or three or more. It is my desire to be able to vote on this subject in an intelligent manner, without bias due to party affiliations. I am, therefore, taking the liberty of asking all qualified persons within the district to let me know their views. Which of the plans under discussion do you think would best serve the country? I should like to hear your reasons for your preference.

I ask this because we have received hundreds of printed letters asking us to support, for example, the Mellon plan and signed "on the dotted line," and most of these letters have come from persons who haven't read any plan and who do not know that there is more than one plan under consideration. One reasoning letter from a person in whose intelligence and disinterestedness I have confidence would be worth more than all the printed appeals put together. For this reason I ask your advice.

I received many well-thought-out replies, and the sentiment in my district seemed to be overwhelmingly in favor of the plan suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Upon my return I was surprised to learn that it was the intention of the leaders of my party to bind all of its members by a caucus to the so-called Democratic plan as proposed by Mr. GARNER. I protested to the minority leader before the caucus was held on the grounds that the plan had not been discussed among the Democratic Members and also, inasmuch as all parties and all Members of the House wanted tax reduction, it could not be considered an exclusive principle of any party. I was not present at the caucus. After the action by the caucus and before a vote was taken upon the tax bill I again wrote to the minority leader, explaining to him what I had done to ascertain the wishes of the residents in my district, and saying that in justice to them and to myself I could not allow myself to be bound by a caucus to which I was not a party. While it is not necessary to discuss the point here, I may say that I consider a binding caucus an archaic custom and wrong in principle; carried to its logical conlusion, we should each of us give his or her proxy to the respective party leaders and then retire for the rest of the session. I make this explanation in order to show that though I have in no way weakened in my adherence to the principles of the Democratic Party I must claim my inherent, if not constitutional, right to vote in accordance with the wishes of my constituents and in conformity with my convictions. For the reasons here given, I voted in the House Friday, February 29, for the Mellon plan—under the Hawley resolution—because I believed it represents the wishes of my constituents. The House failing to adopt the Mellon plan, I then voted for the next best plan obtainable, which is the compromise which was finally adopted.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I can not support the bill with the Longworth rates. As I see it, real questions of principle are at stake, and the Longworth compromise, though in many respects better than the Garner plan, is equally inconsistent with those principles.

Forty-three and one-half per cent—6 per cent normal and 37½ per cent surtax—of income can be no more easily collected than 50 per cent, and we know from experience that a 50 per cent tax merely invites evasion. A tax which can not be collected is a dishonest tax. A law which can not be enforced is a fraud. When, in addition, this mere shaking of fists at the rich, this threatening, if ineffective, gesture, has deplorable economic results it is simply indefensible.

In the second place, the inheritance-tax situation throughout the country, with the double and triple taxation of the same estate by two or more States, is sufficiently chaotic without further haphazard interference by the Federal Government. Here is a field for wise tax reform in which I am satisfied the Federal Government must take the lead in working out a comprehensive and constructive program of readjustment. The difficulties are enormous. They can not be overcome without a thorough and painstaking investigation and study. An arbitrary increase in rates without hearings, without consideration, after a short two hours of debate, is trifling with a most important question and must have most unfortunate results.

Finally, the bill will in all probability produce a deficit, a smaller deficit than the Garner rates, but still a deficit. This is a major defect in a revenue bill, justifying its rejection.

Mr. GRIEST. Mr. Speaker, the pending tax bill if enacted into law will take its place among more than three score tax measures placed upon the statute books of the United States since the beginning of our Government.

I present the following compilation of all these measures, giving the date of their enactment and the taxable subjects referred to therein, for the information of the Congress and the country. It is believed by the officials of the Legislative Reference Division of the Library of Congress that the enactments named below cover all the tax laws other than tariff acts and purely administrative and repealing provisions enacted by Congress since the establishment of our Government:

INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS, 1789–1923.

(Exclusive of taxes on liquor and tobacco, administrative provisions, and laws merely repealing taxes.)

Act of June 5, 1794: Tax on carriages (1 Stat. 373–375).

Act of June 5, 1794: Tax on snuff and refined sugar (1 Stat. 384–390).

Act of May 28, 1796: Tax on carriages (1 Stat. 478–482).

Act of July 6, 1797: Tax on vellum, parchment, and paper, including paper used for certificates of naturalization, licenses of attorneys, letters patent, charter parties, bottomry and respondentia bonds, receipts for legacies, insurance policies, exemplifications, bonds, bills of exchange, promissory notes, protests, powers of attorney, drawback certificates and debentures, bills of lading, inventories, insurance and bank shares (1 Stat. 527–532).

Act of February 28, 1799: Amendment of act of July 6, 1797 (1 Stat. 622–624).

Act of July 24, 1813: Tax on refined sugar (3 Stat. 35–38).

Act of July 24, 1813: Tax on carriages (3 Stat. 40–41).

Act of July 24, 1813: Tax on sales at auction (3 Stat. 44–47).

Act of August 2, 1813: License tax on retailers of liquor and foreign merchandise (3 Stat. 72–73).

Act of August 2, 1813: Tax on bank notes, bonds, and bills of exchange (3 Stat. 77–81).

Act of December 15, 1814: Tax on carriages (3 Stat. 148–151).

Act of December 23, 1814: Tax on sales at auction, license tax on retailers of liquors and foreign merchandise (3 Stat. 159–161).

Act of January 18, 1815: Tax on manufactured iron, candles, hats, umbrellas, paper, playing and visiting cards, saddles and bridles, boots, leather (3 Stat. 180–186).

Act of January 18, 1815: Tax on household furniture and watches (3 Stat. 186–192).

Act of February 27, 1815: Tax on gold, silver, and jewelry (3 Stat. 217).

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of those who believe the plan of tax reduction approved by the administration, and currently referred to as the Mellon plan, I offered the amendment in the House which proposed the adoption of this plan; and this amendment received 135 votes in the House on roll call.

The adherence of the Republican Party to sound financial policies and competent administration of the Treasury is historic.

The proposals for tax reduction contained in this plan are based upon scientific determination of the effect upon the revenue of the rates proposed, and the decreases have been distributed among the taxpaying public to give the largest possible measure of relief to the greatest number.

The country has read it, considered it, understood it, and voiced its approval in no uncertain terms. Not since it championed the gold standard has the financial policy of the Republican Party been so strongly indorsed by the people, irrespective of geographical distribution or party affiliation.

Its terms are too well known to need restatement at this time. The reduction in normal taxes, with the provision for earned incomes, gives to the hundreds of thousands of taxpayers in the lower brackets by far the greater proportion of the total amount of relief from taxation. By limiting the surtaxes to a maximum of 25 per cent and reducing correspondingly the rates in all brackets below capital will be diverted from the field of tax-exempt securities into industry and commerce. The Treasury will be furnished with revenues sufficient for the conduct of the Government by taxes earned on a greatly increased volume of income taxed at these lower rates.

The primary purpose of a revenue bill is to raise revenue, that the Treasury may at all times meet the demands constantly accruing upon it. The tax burden should be fairly distributed. A tax bill that intentionally fails to supply the Treasury adequately is inherently bad.

The Garner rates are financially unsound, and would have wrought injury to the country. We have preferred rates more adequate and better adjusted to its needs. When the rates proposed in the amendment, commonly referred to as the Mellon rates, were not agreed to by the House, I voted for the plan proposing a maximum surtax of 37½ per cent, as against the Garner rates, and voted for the bill on final passage. The Garner rates on normal and surtaxes are so readjusted as to produce a loss of revenue of approximately $511,000,000 which, together with the other reductions in excise taxes, will result in a deficit of over $300,000,000 in the Treasury. This Garner plan is political rather than financial, a makeshift rather than scientific, not adapted to the needs of the country, and above all creates a great and growing deficit in the Treasury. The only way by which deficits can be wiped out is by taxes obtained from the people. The Government is not a profit-making enterprise. Deficits increase the tax burden for subsequent years and impair the credit of the United States. The year 1924 is a presidential year. Hence we have the Garner political rates.

We had, therefore, the astonishing spectacle of a country at peace with all the world, well to do, willing to pay necessary taxes, proud of the honor and credit of their Government, compelled to face, had the Garner rates become effective, a large and constantly increasing deficit in the public revenue.

When the 1918 revenue act was passed with a maximum surtax rate of 65 per cent and with a normal tax rate of 8 per cent on taxable amounts in excess of $4,000, the country was engaged in war, and had taken over many industries and was subsidizing others for the production of war materials—food, clothing, munitions, and so forth—and part of the taxes collected were needed to furnishing capital to such industries.

When the revenue act of 1921 was enacted, with its continuance of the normal tax rates and a maximum surtax of 50 per cent, the Government was still in need of money for capital account with which to effect settlement of claims arising out of the war.

But in 1924 the Government is no longer under the necessity of making expenditures on capital account, having retired from the field of production. Private enterprise has again resumed the conduct of industry, commerce, and agriculture, and undertaken to provide the necessary funds, and in order then that they may have the benefit of funds formerly taken by the Government in taxes under the stress of war we proposed a 25 per cent reduction in the normal taxes and a maximum surtax of 25 per cent; that is, when the Government, under the urgencies of war, needs money as capital for the production of the material of war, high taxes prevail, but when private enterprise resumed the responsibility for production we proposed to reduce taxes and leave the capital in its hands.

High rates of surtaxes are not necessary to provide the funds the Treasury needs, nor will they relieve our industries or open the way to an increased general national prosperity.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, no doubt these two little words that are placed here on page 167 have escaped your attention, and in fact I expect there are very few of the Members that even knew they were there, and of those that did know they were there, very few of them have paid any attention to just what they mean, and were it not that my attention has been called to them I do not expect that I would have paid any attention to them; and right here I want to say that while I am in the furniture business I am in no way financially interested in any factory that manufactures smoking stands; but I know what it means to those that do manufacture them—to the dealers throughout the country that handles them, and the people that buy them for their homes.

These are very small items and can not produce much revenue; in fact I am sure the tax collected on them is not over $100,000 a year, and I do not doubt but what it costs from 50 to 75 per cent of this amount to collect it; but, on the other hand, it is a big handicap to the manufacturers of these small articles, and gentlemen, if you will take time to consider these items, you will agree with me that it is not right to tax any article that is produced for the purpose of making better and happier homes.

I would not say anything about these items if the committee had seen fit to put a tax on smoking stands that are sold by the manufacturer for $50 or more, for then they would be sold to people with homes who could well afford to pay a tax; but when it comes to taxing articles of furniture that are manufactured for our average workingmen, farmers, professional men, and small business men's homes I want to say frankly that I am against it; and I think every member of this committee should be against it, especially when the tax collected means practically nothing to the Government.

Everywhere we go to-day we hear much about the un-American spirit that prevails throughout our country, and that everything should be done by our leaders to check it in every way possible. To my mind one of the best ways to make better American citizens is to have better homes for them to live in, and after we have better homes we must have happy homes, and one of the best ways to make happy homes is to have good furniture in them; and when we have happy homes every Member of this House knows that we will not need to concern ourselves as to whether or not the Constitution of the United States will be upheld, for our American citizens will have something vital to protect and something for which they will be proud to follow the American flag.

Gentlemen of the House, I trust that you can see your way clear to support this amendment, as it does not mean much revenue to the Government, due to the fact that it costs 50 to 75 per cent to collect all tax obtained from these items.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the proposed Garner plan for tax reduction was, in my judgment, impossible from every point of view, including that of the Secretary of the Treasury, for it would have produced a serious deficit in the revenues. Therefore, it was a great gain to supplant it with the schedule of rates proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. It is said that the Longworth rates are the best that could be secured by compromise, and it is a matter for congratulation that all Republicans of all brands are committed to a program no worse than the compromise.

Republicans who still believe that a sound, well-balanced tax reduction plan was being rejected for this makeshift compromise were justified in voting for it as the best that could be secured under existing circumstances. Therefore, I have no criticism whatever for those who, trying to secure the best, took the best they could get.

After all, the compromise at its best is only a makeshift, and I failed to give it my approval because I felt that its enactment into law at this time would make genuine tax reform more difficult or perhaps impossible hereafter. It makes a horizontal reduction of 25 per cent in the surtaxes. This, however, is not enough to accomplish the primary purpose of the Mellon proposal, which is to unshackle business investment. The surtax rates in the compromise will not effect this purpose. If a man can not swim he will drown in 10 feet of water just the same as in 100 feet.

Another serious defect in the compromise as well as in the Garner plan and one hard to remedy when once in the law is the too severe cut in the normal tax of moderately small incomes. I refer to the bracket under $8,000 in which the salaries of Congressmen unfortunately fall. A very large revenue comes from this class—very little of it from Congressmen, of course—so large that if cut as proposed in the compromise, other and far more important reductions will have to be indefinitely postponed. It would have been worse had the Garner rates been adopted.

The people who pay in this class are neither poor nor rich, and its payment by them affects economic conditions less seriously than if paid by any other class. For instance, a reduction of my tax by $100 more than under the Mellon rates is, of course, acceptable, but I doubt whether this reduction to me and to a million other taxpayers in my class will do half as much good to the country at large as would a further reduction in the surtaxes and the removal of more of the objectionable war-excise taxes.

There are other serious defects for which the compromise is in no wise responsible, having been put into the bill under the Garner leadership before the compromise was agreed upon, but which likewise will be difficult to get rid of when once in the law. I refer first to the increased inheritance tax, which will rob the States of large amounts of capital which should remain in the States for local taxation instead of being sent to Washington for questionable governmental expenditures. The new gift tax is open to the same criticism.

The "Peeping Tom" amendment by which partisan committees of Congress for purely partisan purposes may pry into and make public the private business affairs of anyone they may desire to criticize is fundamentally vicious and under present conditions at the other end of the Capitol will probably be made worse rather than better.

The provision for the refund of 25 per cent of the income tax payable this year should be taken out of the present bill and sent through as a separate bill. This would give immediate tax reduction, not scientific by any means, but doing approximate justice, and this could be continued next year if necessary.

Meanwhile the entire matter unhampered by any makeshift could be submitted to the final authority, the people themselves, for their consideration and advice. With their mandate the Republican Party, having been given power equal to its responsibility, would be in a position to give the country what it is entitled to—a real, sound, well-considered tax reduction and tax reform.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, the charge of partisan politics is being bandied back and forth, hotly repudiated by both sides. The question of taxation is neither partisan nor personal, but should consider the greatest good of the greatest number. I am for that form of taxation that shall provide sufficient money to take care of our Government. That is what taxes are for—to provide revenue to run the Government. The Garner plan, while it sounds well, will not provide in the long run sufficient revenue. I voted for the Frear plan and against the Mellon plan, both of which I think to be the two extremes, but I would rather err on the side of the common taxpayer than be classed with those who have no regard for the troubles of the poor. The real Yankee idea of justice to everybody concerned, it seems to me, is a compromise between these two extremes, the Longworth amendment, which cuts everybody's taxes, rich and poor alike, 25 per cent. The increase in the inheritance tax from 25 per cent to 40 per cent, graduating from 1 per cent on amounts over $50,000 to 40 per cent over $10,000,000, together with the gift tax, which is a counterpart of the inheritance tax, will more than furnish the needed money for the back pay of the soldiers and show an attitude of justice for our liabilities.

The Government clerks receiving a bonus look upon it as part of their salary. There is nothing in the service the soldiers rendered that should cut them out from their slight back pay. We bonused the manufacturer where he lost money on account of preparation for a war that did not continue. We bonused the munitions maker, the miner, the shipowner, the shipbuilder, the manufacturer, because the war did not continue, and in this bill we even purpose—and I think it is right—to bonus the taxpayer, for we are intending in this bill to reduce and give back 25 per cent of the taxes due for last year and collectible under the present law.

Money should stand its share of war expense. It has had protection through the men who fought our battles and it should be willing to pay its just share. If not willing, it should be made to pay.

I voted against the Mellon plan because it is truly a "Mellon"-aire proposition and is constructed entirely to serve the millionaire. Instead of making a straight cut of 25 per cent all the way down the line it sought to cut the big fellow down 50 per cent while giving to the little fellow the smaller ratio of 10 to 25 per cent.

The Longworth compromise is strictly the consensus of the Republican idea, is a Republican measure, and should have the support of every Republican in the House, together with such other party designations as have the welfare of the country at heart, consistent with taking care of the soldiers' compensation and having sufficient money to take care of the Government's obligations.

This bill, I am informed by those in authority, will not only reduce the taxes 25 per cent all down the line, but will over and above furnish the money necessary for the soldiers' compensation, and thus avoid the President's veto on that excuse.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the House tax-reduction bill is several hundred per cent better and more equitable than the make-believe "scientific" Mellon bill. The House bill gives a tax cut of over $400,000,000. One hundred million dollars of this amount the Mellon bill gave to telephones, telegraph, and theaters with a return assured in propaganda. The House bill extends the tax cut to automobiles, stamps, jewelry, candy, seat tax, and other nuisance taxes that are reduced or wiped out. The Mellon bill gave another hundred million to earned income, including 12 officials of one oil company who receive a combined salary of over $1,000,000. The House bill cuts off, without any evidence required, one-quarter of all incomes under $5,000 from whatever source derived, all treated as earned income. Above $5,000 and to a maximum limit of $20,000 income, the right to further reduction is a matter of evidence.

The Mellon bill gave over $200,000,000 tax cut to income-tax payers, with 5 per cent of the total taxpayers at the top getting approximately one-half of the Mellon cut, and a measly one-quarter cut for the remaining 95 per cent of the tax-paying multitude. The House compromise bill dumped this scientific (?) cut into the wastebasket and reversed the order of distribution, giving a one-half tax cut to the 95 per centers and a one-quarter tax cut to the high-rolling 5 per centers, keeping in mind the old tax principle that a net income tax can not be passed on, and tax burdens so far as possible should be distributed according to ability to pay.

This cardinal principle was never considered by the "scientific," sham plan, put forth by the Treasury for Congress to pass, prepared by no one knows who; without one witness offered or a single income-tax hearing; strong only in propaganda and tax buncombe, repeatedly exploded and as repeatedly urged by favored interests; interests that alleged in one breath they dodged all income taxes and yet insisted the tax be removed for the public good.

In the House bill has been written a modified publicity clause, a higher estate-tax rate, a credit to States of 25 per cent thereon; a gift tax intended to supplement the estate tax and other needed wholesome amendments. The Mellon plan, after several million dollars spent in propaganda, only received slightly more than one-third the vote of the House; the House bill was passed by 408 affirmative votes on roll call.

That, in brief, is the difference between the Mellon bill and the House bill. Partisanship was never more in evidence than during the preparation and discussion of the tax bill just passed by the House. Representative GARNER, author of the Garner rates, Minority Leader GARRETT, Whip OLDFIELD, a liberal, Representative CORDELL HULL, of the Democratic National Committee, and every other Democratic Member, however, made possible the compromise bill by their opposition to the Mellon plan. Any attempt to misrepresent or make political capital out of the result only serves to emphasize the straits of those who would substitute cheap politics for statesmanship.

Democratic Members, with over 60 independent Republicans, helped defeat the Mellon bill and by such course compelled passage of a compromise tax measure more simple and scientific than either the Mellon or Garner plan. To the independent action of Members of both political parties the result is due.

Progressive Republicans, who secured the compromise in all its details, accept full responsibility therefor but will leave political partisans to scramble for whatever glory is to be had from the result.

The Mellon bill was conceived behind closed doors by selfish interests, concealed to the end. That bill juggled tax brackets and was "scientific" only in its attempt to give great tax cuts to big taxpayers and small relief to the great army of small taxpayers.

Last session a generous legislative gift to big business came from Congress in the shape of a repeal of the excess-profits tax which aggregated $450,000,000 tax annually, combined with a reduction of high surtaxes from 65 per cent to 50 per cent, adding about $50,000,000, according to estimates, or in all a $500,000,000 tax reduction was given to big business without any remission of taxes to the small man least able to pay.

The Mellon bill sought to compel another great legislative gift and declared for a 50 per cent reduction in upper brackets for the millionaire class and only 25 per cent tax reduction for the great tax-paying multitude.

The Mellon bill was prepared by men representing great wealth and supported by the greatest propaganda of all history, variously estimated to have cost several million dollars. With a novel new argument of "frozen credits," "aid to business," relief from "soaking the rich," and other catch words, the bill was placed on the table of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, that representing the House, the only body under the Constitution authorized to originate revenue legislation. Republican members then split in committee over the bill, over its unprecedented method of presentation, its concealed authorship and demand to sign on the dotted line. Demand for its immediate and unqualified acceptance from Secretary Mellon and other high officials met with opposition.

The Democratic organization of the House thereupon prepared a tax bill along different and more equitable lines, and in party caucus bound its members to the Garner rates. The Republican organization, split by the Mellon bill into two factions, refused to accept the so-called Mellon income-tax rates, but, on the other hand, a new test of party regularity for Republicans was invoked to oppose the Garner income rates proposed for substitution in the bill.

Progressive Republicans interested in giving substantial relief to small taxpayers prepared a separate bill that was also submitted in committee, wherein reduction of one-half normal tax rates was urged, thereby giving a total income-tax reduction of $184,000,000, of which amount small taxpayers would receive a 50 per cent tax cut, while less reductions were given to those best able to pay. In view of great tax reductions given to the latter by the last preceding revenue bill, this was claimed to be equitable and just.

The progressive group's income-tax amendment was defeated and then, when confronted by either the Mellon or Garner tax rates, Republican progressives unhesitatingly accepted the Garner rates, which were voted into the bill, although accompanied with Treasury estimates that the Garner rates would probably leave a deficit of from $150,000,000 to $300,000,000.

This wide range of estimates was not persuasive, but calculated to influence the Executive when called upon to act, so we prepared needed amendments to make up the deficit.

Then arose an unparalleled situation in legislative history of the House. Mellon-plan advocates gave out that the Garner rates, because of threatened deficit, would insure the bill's veto by the Executive, and hot-heads sought to defeat the bill by adding increased tax cuts beyond estimates, refusing to add new tax revenues to meet the threatened deficit.

On every vote in the committee Progressive Republicans endeavored to protect the bill and refused to countenance partisan blindness that would rule or ruin. Thus far the situation is well known, and efforts to save the tax bill thereupon devolved largely upon the progressive group of the House, that accepted full responsibility without hesitation.

To meet the threatened Garner tax rates deficit and provide needed tax reform, a measure was first offered by progressive

Members to tax so-called tax-free securities, leaving a decision therefor to the court. Briefs and authorities were submitted as to constitutionality in support of this plan, but opposition came unexpectedly from leaders of both political parties in the House and the proposed amendment failed, although supported by a few independent Members on both sides of the aisle.

A strong effort to tax stock dividends also having failed, progressive Republicans next offered an amendment to tax undistributed profits of corporations 10 per cent, which would bring to the Treasury $200,000,000 or more annually, a tax in principle identical with taxation of stock dividends. It had been proposed originally by Secretary Houston in 1921, and is more equitable and just than the present 12½ per cent corporation normal tax. This amendment met the same fate at the hands of Republican and Democratic leaders. I offer no criticism, but am disclosing efforts to meet the threatened deficit.

A vigorous effort was next made by the progressive group to secure reenactment of a moderate excess-profits tax with a 10 per cent rate in the lower brackets. This it was roughly estimated would bring from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 increased revenues, based on receipts of 1921, and would meet any threatened deficit prophesied from adoption of the Garner rates. Again came failure through opposition of both Democratic and Republican leaders.

Other measures offered, including general publicity of income records, met with opposition from party leaders on both sides of the aisle.

Inheritance-tax rates were increased, accompanied by a 25 per cent credit for State taxes paid—an amendment I offered—while a gift tax offered by Chairman GREEN, both of which were opposed by the regular Republican organization of the House, were supported by independent Republicans and the Democratic membership generally. These latter measures were estimated to bring in only $20,000,000 additional revenue which, however, would be more than wiped out by an additional automobile-tax cut beyond estimates made in committee.

I have endeavored to give credit and fix responsibility without partisanship, although party influence unfortunately has been conspicuous throughout consideration of the tax bill.

We were finally confronted with a probable Treasury deficit of $200,000,000 or more by adoption of the Garner rates and refusal to accept amendments that would give needed revenues, with a probability of threatened presidential veto. If the bill with Garner rates was signed, as declared likely by Democratic leaders, a large deficit would cause the soldiers' compensation bill to be vetoed and probably prevent its becoming law.

With this situation, wherein partisan politics seemed to be strongly in evidence on both sides, the progressive Republican organization offered to renew its first tax proposal or to consider any plan that would give relief to small taxpayers, with incidental tax reduction for those best able to pay. The proposals made to and from the Republican organization were finally agreed to after important concessions were made of a normal-tax cut of one-half rates, or 2 per cent, up to $4,000 and a cut of three-eighths, or 5 per cent, from $4,000 to $8,000. With the average exemption of $2,000, this makes a tax reduction of from 50 per cent to 62 per cent for over 95 per cent of all the income-tax payers of the country who pay on $10,000 incomes or less, and is substantially the plan first offered by the progressive group. A straight cut of 25 per cent on all surtaxes now in the bill is based on existing law, and an added an added 2 per cent cut on the 8 per cent normal tax gives a fair reduction on large income taxes of over one-quarter off from the present tax payments. A one-half tax cut for small income-tax payers, with the added earned-income tax cut computed on $5,000 and under, gives the following generous tax reduction on small incomes as now carried in the bill passed by the House:

Income.	Present tax.	New rate.	Saving.	Per cent tax cut.
$4,000	$160	$60.00	$100.00	62½
$6,000	240	97.50	142.50	59½
$6,080	320	147.50	172.50	54
$7,000	410	197.50	212.50	52
$8,000	500	247.50	252.50	50½

The $2,000 added average exemption brings this needed relief to incomes of $10,000 or less paid by 95 per cent of the people, with smaller reduction for the remaining 5 per cent of the taxpayers. A further tax cut on incomes from $6,000 to $8,000 occurs where earned income is proven.

A tax cut of 25 per cent in present surtax rates that now reach 50 per cent maximum, in effect, brings maximum rates down to 37½ per cent, but the 0 per cent normal tax added makes the total maximum income tax rates 43¾ per cent, as passed by the House.

These rates compare favorably with the Garner tax rates, they are a matter of compromise and were agreed to on a bill that we were assured will come within the margin of surplus, whereas the Garner rates, we were warned officially, would leave a large deficit and jeopardize the passage of a soldiers' bonus bill, alternatives unthinkable and indefensible. In this I have laid no stress on the failure of Democratic and Republican leaders to support amendments whereby to meet the deficit caused by the proposed Garner rates, nor have I discussed the attitude of certain leaders on the soldiers' compensation bill in the past. These are matters of individual judgment, but I am stating a situation that caused progressive Republicans of the House, when their amendments to meet a threatened deficit were rejected, to throw their entire support to a compromise on income-tax rates which were voted in the bill and subsequently were supported by 408 Members of the House. In addition we held fast to every amendment secured in Committee of the Whole and kept faith throughout with principles while refusing to engage in political juggling or partisan jobbing.

Charges by Republican or Democratic press of any coalition were at all times foolish and unfounded. Without partisanship we sought to get the best tax bill possible out of committee and through the House. We ask for no credit nor fear criticism. The Mellon plan died before it was born and millions spent in propaganda failed to influence Congress that knows the game as it was played.

Any man whose name is linked with the bill passed by the House may feel honored from the fact that the measure grants annually $400,000,000 relief to millions of taxpayers; is likely to come within the limit set apart for income-tax reductions; and is so far removed from the "scientific" Mellon great gift to large wealth that it bears not the slightest resemblance to that plan.

For the splendid group of independent Members who brought order out of political chaos and saved a tax bill that will do full justice to those least able to pay, gratitude is expressed. Never once did they falter in their support, and such action came from an intelligent understanding of every proposition considered, for they had informed themselves regarding tax principles, brackets, and rates, and individually were competent to pass judgment on the different plans without advice.

They helped improve a tax bill by insertion of many needed amendments, and when called upon to act did not hesitate to put their oaths as Members above pleas of party regularity. The bill, contested for three weeks, finally found support from over 400 Members of the House, irrespective of partisanship. That is glory enough in itself. Of far greater importance were appeals made from the Chair's ruling, first by a vote of 315 Members and second by 254, when, joining with Democratic Members, the Chair was overruled by the progressive group and a principle laid down that the House refuses to be tied hand and foot or longer gagged when considering a revenue bill. Hereafter the House will assert its legislative rights like the Senate and other great parliamentary bodies and will function as authorized under the Constitution.

Briefly, I have reviewed a bill which after long controversy gives large tax relief to millions of people and reduces nuisance, income, and other taxes to an amount annually reaching over $400,000,000. These results were made possible by the small group of progressive Members who held the balance of power and yet refused to permit that power to be used as a political football.

The most just and equitable income tax bill ever passed by the House of Representatives is due largely to their efforts. For the truth of that claim I again point to its acceptance in all its terms by 408 Members, a verdict never before given any tax measure passed by the House of Representaitves. May the example of independent action bring others to recognize that party regularity and partisan politics have no place in tax legislation, while the bipartisanship of powerful invisible government, omnipresent in this tax bill, it has been shown can be met and overcome by legislation in the open.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, on February 28 the House of Representatives overthrew the decision of a controlling element in the Ways and Means Committee that there should be no reduction of the tremendous burden of Federal war excise taxes on the motorists of the country. A strenuous effort had been made before the committee by representatives of the motorists' organizations of the country and of farmers' organizations to have at least a measure of reduction of these taxes. But their pleas were unavailing, although the committee recommended some $320,000,000 reductions for various classes of taxpayers, including some $103,000,000 reductions for war excise taxes on commodities such as candy, soft drinks, telegraphs and telephones, theater tickets, jewelry, etc.

A hot battle was waged in the committee itself by Members thereof for reduction, both by Republicans and Democrats. Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan and Mr. CROWTHER of New York made motions for repeal of certain taxes, I am informed, but lost. Various Democrats, including Mr. GARNER of Texas, Mr. OLDFIELD of Arkansas, Mr. RAINEY of Illinois, Mr. COLLIER of Mississippi, and Mr. CASEY of Pennsylvania also made motions for total or partial repeal of these taxes, according to the best information obtainable. They lost also.

During the very last sittings of the committee on war excise taxes, I believe, a majority of the committee, two Republicans and 11 Democrats, were fighting for some measure of relief for motorists, but I am informed points of order were made against such motions at that time and were sustained.

THE OLD GUARD PRESSED HARD, BUT WINS.

Thus a coterie in the committee, hostile to relief for motorists, were able to get the bill to the floor of the House without any auto tax reductions of benefit therein.

Representatives of motorists had fought the same fight with Secretary of the Treasury Mellon and had lost. He recommended many other tax reductions on transportation, on luxuries, and on amusements, but set his face like flint against the motorists.

It has been the same story for the past few years—motorists losing their contests both with the Secretary of the Treasury and with Congress.

THE SUN BEGINS TO SHINE.

But the turning point came on February 28 on the floor of the House with a coalition of Democrats and Republicans overturning the decision of the controlling element of the Ways and Means, and granting relief of approximately $23,500,000 out of a total of $146,000,000 of these taxes, figured on returns of the past fiscal year.

Representatives of the motorists' organizations were satisfied with the above amount of reduction and feared to ask any more at the eleventh hour because of the danger of jeopardizing the revenue bill. They expect to continue the fight in the Senate in the near future and in the House and Senate next December for greater reductions of these taxes.

NAUGHTY MOTORISTS PUT TO WORK WITH THE ROAD GANG.

It is sometimes argued by objectors to reduction of Federal war excise auto taxes that the autos use the roads and therefore should pay for them.

If this argument held good there should be excise taxes on ships which use canals, rivers, harbors, inland lakes, and so forth. To follow out the auto parallel, there should not only be a tax on the ships proper, but on parts and accessories and replacements and repairs. Thus there would be an extra tax on rudders, smokestacks, anchors, ropes and cables, compasses, the coal which is used for motive power as gasoline is used for auto motive power, and so forth.

REDUCTIO AD ABSURDUM.

There would be a tax for tugs, dredges, passenger and freight ships, sailboats, motor boats, pleasure yachts, rowboats, fishing boats, and canoes.

As a matter of fact water highways are developed out of the Public Treasury for the common good and the general welfare.

It is true that American ships pay tolls going through the Panama Canal, but that is because of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The American Congress and President Taft made it law that these tolls should not be charged, so that freight and passenger rates between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts should be cheaper. That was for the common good, although the canal cost the people about $400,000,000 and a large sum also each year to operate.

President Wilson advocated the repeal of the free tolls act, of which a Congressman from Detroit [Mr. DOREMUS] was the author, not because of the principle that ships should be taxed for using the canal, but because he said it broke the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and a question of honor and treaty obligations with a foreign power was involved.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended out of the Public Treasury for developing rivers, harbors, and so forth. Figures from the message of the President transmitting the Budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, show an estimate of $40,000,000 for rivers and harbors. For 1922 the amount was $43,316,668, and for the current year the estimated expenditure is $48,000,000.

RAILROAD-OWNED SHIPS BARRED FROM WATERWAYS BECAUSE OF THEIR UNFAIR METHODS.

It is very significant in view of the alleged antagonism of railroad interests to the development of the automobile and motor truck that the Congress of the United States saw fit, after very careful consideration, to pass the Panama Canal act of 1914 which forbids railroads to own competing water carriers.

The underlying reason was that railroads considered only their own interest and their own profits. When they went into the shipping business, often they would lower the freight and passenger rates until they had put competitors with less capital out of business, destroying them by a rate war. Then, not being checked by competition, they raised rates to suit their convenience and gouged the public unmercifully.

Therefore, the Interstate Commerce Commission, taking its cue and its authority from the Panama Canal act of 1914, ordered various railroad companies to get off the Great Lakes, to sell their ships and get out of business.

Like common criminals, not observing the amenities necessary for organized society, they were made outcasts.

DARK SHIPS THAT PASSED IN THE DARK.

In 1915, actions were begun against companies and ships owned by the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Lehigh, the New York Central, the Erie, the Rutland, the Grand Trunk, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, and the Canada Atlantic.

Their splendid liners were sold for whatever price the railroads could get in the open market.

"FINGY" AND JULIUS K. ENTER.

William J. Conners, who rose from the stevedore ranks to be a magnate and who rejoiced when on the docks in the sobriquet of "Fingy" Conners, bought in most of these boats, and organized the Great Lakes Transit Co., one of the valuable and best-known transportation companies of the Great Lakes.

It is noteworthy also that Julius Kruttschnitt, who states the case so energetically and powerfully for the railroads against the passenger automobile and the motor truck in certain Senate committee hearings, has been the dominating personality of the Southern Pacific Railroad for some time. He is chairman of the board of directors and has been recognized for some time as one of the chief spokesmen before the country for the railroads.

These hearings may be found reported in a Senate document entitled, "Hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, United States Senate, pursuant to Senate Resolution 23, relating to revenues and expenses of railroads, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, volume 1, May 10 to June 1, 1921." The testimony of Mr. Kruttschnitt with particular reference to auto competition is found on pages 40 to 44.

PANAMA CANAL GETS TO COVER.

It is pertinent that the Panama Canal act of 1914 is directed particularly against transcontinental railroads and Mr. Kruttschnitt directs one of these which is barred for the sake of general welfare from operating competing ships through the Panama Canal, which was built with the public moneys for the public good.

I am going to quote excerpts from Mr. Kruttschnitt's testimony and colloquy in the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee hearing. I will do so at some length because his viewpoint is so refreshing. His attitude that all agencies advancing the cause of mankind and civilization and competing with railroads, must be hampered to keep pace with railroads in difficulty through poor management or otherwise, is of vital interest to the automotive industry. The latter, by its fair political methods and its absence of desire to control all sorts of governmental agencies to promote selfish ends inimical to the general good, affords a striking contrast.

The predominating purpose of the auto people, so far, has been to make life easier and happier for all mankind. May they always cherish that ideal!

ENTER THAT VILLAIN, SUBSIDY.

The general argument of friends of the railroad interests is that the automobile and motor truck are subsidized by the public, which provides them free highways. They compete with the railroads. Why should they not be taxed, and heavily?

First let me remark that railroad people should understand subsidies because practically every railroad was subsidized by public annuities or grants of one character or another when it was constructed. Public land equal to the area of the thirteen original States has been granted to the railroads. That is one of the most astounding facts in American history or in the history of the world!

Roman roads are one of the outstanding facts of civilization and they existed throughout the centuries until to-day in splendid condition, but if one were to believe the opponents of auto-tax reduction the geniuses of the Roman Republic and Empire built them with the automobile in view. The contention to-day is that roads are built to-day only for the automobile, and the motorist should pay, pay, pay! Rome and all countries of all times have built roads to advance the general welfare.

LIVE AND LET LIVE.

The sane view and the "live-and-let-live view" is that the proper field of the motor truck is in coordination with the railroad. To-day 157 railroad systems are using the truck in short hauls, in terminal operations, and for similar purposes. It is a complementary service which gives the shipper a more efficient completed transportation.

Studies of the Bureau of Public Roads shows that 67 per cent of all of the truck movement in Connecticut is under 70 miles. That which goes farther does so because it can haul more cheaply or because of rail congestion. Where the motor truck provides an economic competition it should abandon long haulage, and that is happening automatically.

Roads would be built if we had no trucks, and they would be paved roads since the measure of road improvement is density of traffic. In most States the truck is paying its share of road cost through special taxes. Where these taxes are not high enough they should be increased, but that is a State tax and should remain so.

WHY BITE THE HAND THAT FEEDS YOU?

The railroads of to-day could not prosper without the motor industry. Last year they derived $200,000,000 revenue from shipment of cars. The raw materials used by motor plants in fabrication of cars, the building materials used in roads, the haulage of gasoline and of the thousand other commodities entering into motor-car production, all contribute to the railroads.

Congress has taken the tax off railroad transportation, yet when a railroad uses a motor truck a special tax must be paid, which must be passed on to the consumer. Is there any difference between these taxes?

Can the railroads or the public afford to penalize an arm of transportation which must be of increasing service in providing a more adequate and more efficient system of collection, delivery, and transportation generally?

There are those who raise the question of taxation paid by motor vehicles and railroads. This is not an issue, as all transportation costs must be paid for by the consumer, hence all transportation taxation is an added burden. It is interesting to note, however, that in 1921 the motor vehicles paid $334,000,000 in special taxes, in addition to garages, income, and so forth, while the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission shows that the rail lines paid $276,000,000 in Federal, State, and local taxes in the same period.

HE'S TAXED HEAVY, ALL RIGHT.

If the purpose of the opponents and oppressors of the motorist is that he shall be taxed and taxed heavily—for it must always be remembered that the taxes are on the motorist and not on the manufacturer, who transmits the tax directly to the buyer of an auto or truck—then the purpose is fully achieved, and with a vengeance.

FIGURES DO NOT LIE.

Taking the 15,000,000 cars in operation to-day, I figure that during their short lives their owners have paid into various governmental treasuries the gigantic, astounding total of $1,245,570,944.23. Why the 23 cents? The figures are an approximation, necessarily, and the exact amount is based, of course, partly on estimates, but which estimates, I maintain, are fair.

The average life of the average car must be gauged through experience of motor experts. The wear and tear can be averaged to the satisfaction of a fair man. Seven years life for a car is a fair estimate.

The Federal war excise taxes to which I object amount to the stupendous sum of $600,183,644.23, as taken from the Federal Government records.

State licenses, including registration fees, gasoline tax, and so forth, are estimated at $510,387,300.

Personal-property taxes now levied in 36 States are estimated for the period at $125,000,000.

Local wheelage taxes in special levies by cities may be estimated for the period at $10,000,000.

These amounts give the total of approximately $1,245,570,000, surely enough to satisfy a Turk taxgatherer or one of those taxgatherers who precipitated the French Revolution and rolled under the heavy, razor-sharp strokes of the guillotine gallant male heads and fair ringleted feminine heads into the dust.

The Federal taxes are detailed as follows: Federal excise tax on new cars for the period, $363,363,593.63; on trucks, $52,637,963.79; on parts, tires, accessories, and so forth, $196,124,556.49; less deduction for repairs to old cars early part of this period, $60,000,000, estimated; total for this classification, $136,124,556.49. Now, take the unsegregated tax collected in 1917 and 1918 of $48,057,530.32, and total Federal war excise taxes are $600,183,644.23.

Surely nobody can fairly quarrel with these figures.

TAXES ON THE PASSENGER CAR IN MARYLAND.

But take the heaped-up taxes in another way. It is fair to consider the neighboring State of Maryland, for nearly every Member of Congress has ridden over the roads of Maryland and knows the sentiment of the people and their standard of Americanization.

The taxes, as I showed on a chart brought into the House cloakroom, are as follows:

1. Federal excise tax on the car.
2. Federal excise tax on tires and parts.
3. State registration fee.
4. Gasoline tax.
5. State property tax.
6. City property tax.
7. Driver's license tax.
8. Certificate of title tax.
9. Property tax on the garage.

In addition, trucks and taxicabs bear five other taxes.

AND THIS IS NOT CALCULUS. YOU CAN GET IT.

And to be more specific yet, take the taxes paid by typical new cars in Baltimore, Md.

The figures are as follows:

Ford touring with self-starter.

Federal, excise on purchase	$14.25
State, horsepower	7.20
State, gasoline	7.00
State, operator's (not for hire)	2.00
State, personal property	.77
State, certificate of title	1.00
City, personal property	7.30
Total	40.52

Also 5 per cent on value of any repair parts, accessories, and tires.

DODGE TOURING.

Federal, excise on purchase	$33.00
State, horsepower	7.68
State, gasoline, estimated (400 gallons, at 2 cents)	8.00
State, operator's (not for hire)	2.00
State, personal property	1.84
State, certificate of title	1.00
City, property	17.40
Total	70.92

Also 5 per cent on value of any repair parts, accessories, and tires.

BUICK "6" TOURING.

Federal, excise on purchase	$58.69
State, horsepower	8.74
State, gasoline, estimated (500 gallons, at 2 cents)	10.00
State, operator's (not for hire)	2.00
State, personal property	3.37
State, certificate of title	1.00
City, personal property	31.90
Total	115.70

Also 5 per cent on value of any repair parts, accessories, and tires.

In addition, trucks, buses, and taxicabs bear five other taxes.

WE WILL PUT POOR JOHN WISE!

Now, it may be said that the average owner of an automobile or truck does not know that he is thus discriminated against. But let every legislator be advised from now on the 15,000,000 owners, their friends, and relatives, are going to be educated to this gouging. That is the duty of the motorists' organizations, of the manufacturers' organizations, to protect these members and these customers from exploitation.

Vigilance and education will relieve these voters. There is no sane reason why such a powerful body of voters, thoroughly organized as they can be, for their names and addresses are available in every community, should be thus persecuted. Police headquarters at least have them registered.

MACHIAVELLI WAS A PIKER.

Now let us consider the philosophy of modern industrial competition with particular reference to one of the basic necessities of life and of organized society as developed by that master, Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt, aforetime director of the board of one of the great American transcontinental railroads. This is in the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee in 1921.

Then see how that philosophy and theory is driven home against me in the House Ways and Means Committee hearings on auto reduction, January 16, 1924.

Then read the statements of Representative OLDFIELD of Arkansas, of the Ways and Means Committee, on railroads and the automotive industry on the floor of the House February 14, 1924, in which he shows the doubtful methods of some railroad men.

Then read the statements of Representative TAGUE of Massachusetts, also on railroads, also a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and also delivered on the floor of the House on February 18, 1924.

IT IS NOT ANCIENT HISTORY.

The combat of ideas depicted therein and of forces so tremendously vital to the ordinary life of every American individual is so thrilling and so pertinent that one is justified in giving the colloquies and statements at length. Moreover, that combat has not yet neared its peak and is to make some American history in the near future.

Meantime may I again disclaim any hostility to the railroads. They are vital. I am not anxious even to discipline them. They should be treated without animus or passion. But they must be taken off the necks of the 15,000,000 American motorists and out of the pockets of these aforesaid gentry.

Enter Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt, and reported in Senate document giving hearings of Interstate Commerce Committee May 10 to June 1, 1921, on Senate Resolution 23.

RIGHT IN FRONT OF A MICHIGAN SENATOR.

Remember that Senator Townsend, who does some of the questioning of Mr. Kruttschnitt, represents the great State of Michigan, the home and center of the automotive industry. Mr. Kruttschnitt knows that and believes his dogmas, doctrines, creeds, and tenets are fully justified. Therefore he enunciates them boldly and devil take the hindmost! Note also that apparently Mr. Kruttschnitt has some friendly Senators querying him.

Mr. Kruttschnitt speaks:

The conditions under which the highways are constructed and operated are grossly discriminative against the railroads and in favor of their competitors. As a rule the improved highway is located immediately adjacent to the right of way of the steam road, where it inflicts the maximum destructive effect on steam-road traffic. Under their charters, which are agreements with the public, the steam carriers must provide and maintain their permanent ways at large expense; are subject to drastic regulations as to profits, living conditions, and terms of employment of those who work for them, and heavy damages for injuries to persons or property. The desire to develop and use the powerful motor trucks and passenger vehicles has blinded the public to the necessity for proper and equitable regulation of this service, which takes thousands of tons of freight and hundreds of thousands of passengers every day from established rail lines. By reason of the unlimited profits that these carriers are thus allowed to earn they can put competing railroad lines out of business or greatly curtail their revenues. Southern Pacific lines alone were deprived of over $4,000,000 of passenger revenues in 1920 by the competition of public motor vehicles. Taxes paid by all the people and to a large extent by the railroads themselves are used for the purpose of providing free highways for vehicles, which are subjected to no regulation for the protection of life and property, and whose heavy wheel loads rapidly destroy the roads. In common justice these public carriers should be required to pay a tax on freight and passengers carried commensurate with the use of and injury to the roads they pass over. The press credits the President to be keenly alive to these inequities and the Legislature of Oregon as being engaged in an investigation of them.

Senator WALCOTT. How did you arrive at that figure of $4,000,000 of loss in passenger revenue in the year 1920?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Because we keep track on the Southern Pacific of the number of these vehicles that are running and the number of people they carry.

Senator WOLCOTT. Well, are they common carriers, these vehicles that you keep track of—bus lines?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. They are common carriers to the extent that private individuals operate them for profit, and for the carriage of freight and passengers, but they are not subject to the laws of common carriers, and that is what I am complaining about. They are favored at the expense of the general public.

Senator WOLCOTT. I understand that.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. In other words, Tom, Dick, and Harry can go and use those roads to make all the money that he can rake in, and he doesn't have to pay anything for it, except for the gasoline to run his machine.

Senator WOLCOTT. I understand your contention on that, and it would seem to have some merit in it—to me at least. But your figures do not take any account of the private individual, the head of a family, who wants to go from town to town, and instead of riding on the train just loads his own family into a car and goes.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. No; I have not mentioned that.

Senator WOLCOTT. So that your figure of $4,000,000 would be an underestimate, if anything?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes; it takes no account of that. We do not keep tab on private automobiles.

Senator WOLCOTT. I was curious to know how you reached that figure.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. But take it in California. They build a new highway, an improved road. That is between two points. We have electric service between those points. The first thing we know some gentleman gets a great big autobus that can carry 40 or 50 people, and he runs it at the expense of the public, and incidentally at ours, because we are heavily taxed, right alongside of us, and takes the passengers from our trains. We can not stop because our business is no longer profitable. This gentleman can take his motorbus off that service any time he pleases; if it is bad weather, he need not run it. But we are tied down by obligations to the public fixed by law.

Senator TOWNSEND. Well, you are assuming, Mr. Kruttschnitt, that everybody that rides in an autotruck or an autocar would otherwise ride on your trains?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That is a fair assumption.

Senator TOWNSEND. Do you think it is?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I don't see why not. If we have a line which is carrying, we will say, a million passengers a month, and a road is built and a number of autobuses put on that carry passengers right alongside of us, it is fair to assume that all they take will be taken from us, unless some of the people who would not ride in the autobuses would buy their own automobiles, and those we do not complain of.

Senator TOWNSEND. Well, I think that has been a long argument of the railroads against the electric lines, that the electric lines that were paralleling them were destroying the steam roads' business—the steam roads' traffic. It has been quite the reverse in many cases, hasn't it? It has encouraged traffic, and your steam lines have not lost, although the electric lines have gained?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. It has been the case where the electric lines have been designedly built as feeders to steam roads to bring the passengers to them; in such cases it has been profitable. But in most cases the electric lines have been built for the specific purpose of taking the traffic, which has been created and fostered by the steam roads, away from them and appropriating it.

The CHAIRMAN. You don't expect, Mr. Kruttschnitt, that the carriage by highway will be stopped?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Senator, I have not dreamed of suggesting that.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I merely suggest, in line with what I say, what the President himself has suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. Precisely.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That it is not right to build these highways, at high cost to the people generally, and then permit a limited number of people to put heavy vehicles on them, vehicles that destroy these highways more rapidly in one trip that a thousand private automobiles would do, and let them reap unlimited profit from that business.

The CHAIRMAN. What you suggest is that those who carry freight for hire or those who carry passengers for hire shall pay a fair license fee or compensation for the privilege of using the roads which have been built and which are maintained by the public?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That is it. To pay a fair, reasonable price for the interest on construction of the roads and their maintenance. Now, take the State of Connecticut. I think the tax on my automobile is somewhere around $15 a year. The tax on heavy motor vehicles I don't think is as much as twice that. It ought to be very, very much more. Because the automobile that I run and that my neighbors run has a light wheel load, does not damage the roads, and we are probably forced into the side ditch by a truck that is carrying 10 or 15 tons.

Senator WOLCOTT. And then the driver will laugh at you.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes; laugh at me. While I have no personal feeling about being crowded into the ditch, except at the time being, when I am irritated, I do think that the fellow that is carrying such enormous loads there and tearing the roads up should be made to pay for it. In other words, he should not, at the expense of the public, reap all of that benefit from it and put it in his pocket. Year before last, after a heavy winter, the roads between New York and Stamford, Conn., were for the whole distance almost impassable. It was detour after detour where the roads had been torn up and were being repaired.

Senator WATSON. This traffic which you speak of, Mr. Kruttschnitt, is largely intrastate; it doesn't run over the State lines much, does it, especially in the western country?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, I am speaking about the local traffic. Of course all the traffic from the factories in Connecticut to New York is interstate.

Senator POMERENE. There are truck lines from Akron, Ohio, to Boston, that have been maintained for several years.

Senator WATSON. Yes; but do they do a great volume of business, Senator?

Senator POMERENE. Yes; they haul a large part of the product of the rubber plants there in that way, so I am advised.

The CHAIRMAN. Your argument is that the Government ought not to subsidize these carriers for hire, which are in competition with the railroads?

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. That is my point exactly, Senator. And they should not be allowed to wreck the business of steam lines, to wreck the property of citizens who have dedicated their money to public use, by the Government limiting the profit of the steam lines and allowing these gentlemen that make these common carrier companies to collect everything they can get without any regulation or limitation whatsoever. I know, living as I do along the New Haven road, you can go on what is called the Boston Post Road, which is a main road from New York to Boston, and the use of the road by the public for pleasure purposes is seriously interfered with by these fleets of these heavy motor trucks carrying machinery, and I don't know what all, from Connecticut factories parallel with the railroad to New York, for export.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? Are these motor trucks run by incorporated companies, or are they run privately by the industry furnishing the product?

Senator POMERENE. The one that I spoke of was run privately by an industry.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Well, I can tell you, Senator, that if you will travel along this road that I have in mind you will see vehicles the size of a good-sized railroad box car on wheels labeled, "John Smith Quick Express Service between Bridgeport and New York." They are owned by private individuals. They are not subject to any regulation or any limitation as to earnings, or any regulations as to providing for the safety of the people they carry. They just proceed on their own hook and get all they can, and the heavier they load the trucks, why presumably the more they make. And there is almost no limit to the amount they put on.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very familiar with the situation, because there are regular lines between New York and Philadelphia across New Jersey maintained at the present time, and they are destroying our roads without paying to the State a proper return for the damage they do.

Senator TOWNSEND. Well, that is largely a matter of regulation for the State, isn't it? The State can fix those charges. There is a license fee upon the users of the automobiles now which maintains the roads very largely after the roads are constructed. Most of the roads depend upon the automobile license fee to maintain the roads.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. That is not so in New Jersey, because they have a reciprocal arrangement with New York State; and if New York licenses the truck, New Jersey will not charge them a license fee, unless there is some recent legislation on that. But is it not interstate commerce from New York to Philadelphia?

Senator TOWNSEND. A great deal of it is.

* * * * * * *

Senator TOWNSEND. The Federal Government is not contributing $1,400,000,000, as you mentioned. The Federal Government has contributed $275,000,000. Now, you got your figures from figures that are frequently stated of the moneys invested in roads. That is the statement that is put up in connection with the Federal aid. The Federal Government has expended only about $275,000,000—appropriated that money for the construction of roads, and that only goes into a very small proportion of the roads of any one State. The balance of this vast amount of money that you are speaking about is the money that the States are appropriating for constructing State and county roads. That is where the large amount comes in.

Senator POINDEXTER. The same principle would apply.

Senator TOWNSEND. The same principle would apply, only your amount is not the Federal money.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. I was going to say that except for the correction that you make the principle still stands, that the public agencies should not discriminate in favor of carriers over the highways.

Senator TOWNSEND. I am very much in favor myself, and have advocated the proposition, that the users of the roads, especially those that use them for profit, should contribute very largely for the maintenance.

Senator POMERENE. For hire.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Those that are used for hire; that is the identical idea that I am arguing. I am not mentioning the private individuals. The private individuals use the roads at a nominal fee. A fee of $12 or $15 for a private automobile is not worth considering.

Senator TOWNSEND. You take your manufacturing concerns—for instance, the Buick people or the Ford people in Detroit; they don't use the roads for hire, but they ship their cars on their own power; they drive them across the country. The roads are full of them; full of those cars when they are delivering them.

The CHAIRMAN. You present rather a difficult problem, Mr. Kruttschnitt, because the public will remember all the while that the Government has made, in one form or another, very large contributions in the construction of steam railroads, in the form of rights of way and other things of that kind. It is pretty hard to tell just where the beneficence of the Government should cease in regard to public highways.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. You must not blame me, Mr. Senator, if I don't remember that, because the Government did advance money to the Central Pacific for its construction and it collected every dollar with interest.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't mean in operations of recent times. I mean the public has given a large part of the right of way that is now used by the railroad companies without any compensation at all.

Mr. KRUTTSCHNITT. Yes; when that right of way was given it wasn't worth anything. Largely over land that was desert. Take our own roads. Most of the right of way is over public lands, over desert lands, which even to-day, with the existence of the railroads, could not be sold over $1 or $1.50 an acre.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Kruttschnitt does not emphasize the land sold at $1,000 per acre and upward, nor that the value of these donated public lands is many hundreds of millions of dollars.

Now, the scene shifts to the House Ways and Means Committee, where your humble servant prances into the arena and points a lance at the somber foe of the "tin Lizzie" and its more opulent kinfolk:

STATEMENT OF HON. E. H. CLANCY, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, I am very glad to follow Mr. BLAND, of Virginia, because he has made clear to you one of the irritating difficulties of this automobile motor-truck law, and if you give your approval to my bill repealing the motor-truck war excise tax the time of future Ways and Means Committees will not be taken up with details of this sort. He has made it quite clear to you that the motor truck is a necessity.

Mr. TREADWAY. He was speaking of it for school purposes. He was only following one line, Mr. CLANCY.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; and you are broadening it now.

Mr. CLANCY. I want to make it broader. I want to reinforce that idea by saying that you consider the railroad a necessity, no doubt, and the Pennsylvania system, the Jersey Central system, and I understand a number of other progressive railroads throughout the country have adopted as a subsidiary transportation system the autotruck lines to relieve the road of the expensive short haul, which is one of the main factors in maintaining high transportation costs. A record was kept for three months in the State of Connecticut on the State highways, and it was ascertained in that small State 1,000,000 tons of freight were carried in autotrucks in the short haul, which is so disastrous to the railroads and to the general public.

Mr. GARNER. Carried how long—in what period of time?

Mr. CLANCY. Three months.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In the entire State?

Mr. CLANCY. In the State of Connecticut; yes, sir; over the State highways.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. CLANCY did not tell you how many million dollars' worth of roads they tore up for Connecticut, nor did he tell you that the New Haven Railroad has been hovering near the edge of bankruptcy for some time because of the loss of business and because it has to maintain its right of way when these trucks do not have to maintain their right of way.

Mr. CLANCY. No; I do not think I could tell you the wear and tear on any road by a person walking across it, or an automobile traveling over it, or by horses traveling over it.

Mr. MILLS. And the New Haven is probably paying taxes in order to maintain the right of way for these trucks that are competing with it.

Mr. TILSON. That is exactly what happens.

Mr. CLANCY. The way the New Haven road has been managed, I do not think God Almighty could save it.

Mr. GARNER. If you follow out that idea, you would stop the use of automobile trucks that the railroads themselves operate for profit.

Mr. TILSON. No; I want them to pay for the roads. That is all I want.

Mr. GARNER. They pay their local taxes now, just the same as the railroads do.

Mr. TILSON. And they ought to pay for their roadbed just the same as the railroads must do.

Mr. GARNER. Probably so; but the railroads can use the trucks. He says the Pennsylvania system is doing that, and they can all do it if they want to.

Mr. TILSON. I do not think they ought to be allowed to use them without paying for the privilege of using the highways. I do not think the Pennsylvania road or any other road should be permitted to use trucks to help out the railroad system and thereby destroy the highways without paying for them.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask Mr. CLANCY this question? Has not the use of the automobile truck developed very gradually from the delivery, perhaps, of small quantities of goods over the highways, and eventually the big truck has come into existence?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TREADWAY. Would you not consider that is the method that has grown up in the country?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, that being the case, have we not failed to legislate for permission, for the establishment of these great thoroughfares and rights of way for them?

Mr. CLANCY. These motor trucks are paying toll into the State treasuries, and that item is taken into consideration by the various State highway commissions in fixing the license taxes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I beg to differ with the gentleman there. You can not begin to figure the destruction to the highways covered by the license that any truck pays, that I know of, in the United States.

Mr. CLANCY. The gentleman is probably aware that about only one-half of the revenues raised from motor taxation is returned for the upkeep of roads. I have the figures here, and they are already in the record, and I will put them in the record again in a brief which I hope to file.

Mr. TREADWAY. I agree with you in this way, Mr. CLANCY: I believe in the commercial value of the automobile; I think we must encourage its use for commercial purposes, but I do not believe that the States or the Federal Government should provide a free right of way to be destroyed at will, and then for the companies making these trucks to come in and ask for a special exemption in the form of taxation in addition to the free rights of way and all the other privileges that they get under the present law. In other words, it looks to me as though we want to put the screws on a little tighter on that kind of transportation, rather than to add to the present privileges. That is the way I look at it.

Mr. CLANCY. I would remind the gentleman—which he undoubtedly knows and has forgotten—that the manufacturer does not pay this tax; the farmer pays the tax.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I beg your pardon. The class of trucks that I am referring to are these tremendous big things that take as much space, carry as much goods, many tons of freight, as a freight car does. No farmer owns one of them in the United States.

Mr. CLANCY. The farmer owns a truck which carries his produce.

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, well, that is a different proposition. I am talking about these great big heavy trucks that destroy the highways.

Mr. CLANCY. The gentleman did not allow me to finish my sentence.

Mr. TREADWAY. I beg your pardon. I will not interrupt you again.

Mr. CLANCY. I was going to say that the farmer, the owner of the truck and the ultimate consumer, pays the tax. The manufacturer does not pay a cent of the tax. He transmits the cost to the purchaser of the motor car.

This motor-truck tax amounts to only $10,700,000. It is one of the most indefensible taxes that you have to consider.

A STORM AROSE; THE THUNDER ROLLED.

By this time the dignified colloquy had become a roaring chorus, with numerous gentlemen shouting questions and answers all at the same time to the utter discomfiture of the committee stenographer. The rest of the hearing was not so clearly a discussion of Mr. Kruttschnitt's dark Machiavellian philosophy, and my audience is spared it.

But now enters Mr. OLDFIELD, of Arkansas, and the scene shifts to the floor of the House, and he is reported on page 2444 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

THE OLD GUARD AGAIN.

Mr. MILLS and the 10 others referred to by Mr. OLDFIELD are the coterie which I frequently called the old guard on the floor of the House and in various statements.

Mr. OLDFIELD speaks:

You ought to understand them thoroughly, and I want to call your attention to the report of Mr. MILLS and the 10 others. He is referring to this section, and on page 42 he says:

> "The railroads of the country have just had a good year, but they have been unable for the last few years to obtain the necessary funds for permanent improvements by inviting more partners and fresh capital and have had to rely on mortgage financing."

Now, if they had not put that in the report, I would not have said anything about the railroads in this argument, but that goes to the country and goes to the railroad owners so that I want to answer that paragraph. Is it not a wonder, gentlemen, that after the experience of the American people with the railroad owners—not exactly the railroad owners of America but the railroad wreckers of America—that they can get anybody to go into partnership with them and give them money with which to carry on their business? I do not want to destroy the railroads; I do not want to hurt the railroads or any other business institutions in America, but I think it comes with poor grace for these men to come here and make an argument for a lower surtax rate in order to help the railroads to get money in order to carry on their business, when everybody knows they wrecked the New York, New Haven & Hartford, and that is the reason why they can not get partners.

They wrecked the Frisco line, they wrecked the Rock Island road, and the Gould outfit wrecked the Gould system. And then these men talk about reducing the surtax in order that they may get fresh money to put into their business.

Everybody knows, and I can prove, that 20 years ago the railroads owned every State legislature in this Union; they debauched everybody who was debauchable, if you please, in the interest of the railroads—not in the interest of the railroads, either, but in the interest of the men who were preparing and fixing to wreck the railroads of the country. And yet they come here, my friends, and ask you to reduce the surtaxes in order that these same railroads may get additional money.

Then, gentlemen, they do not want to take off the taxes on automobile trucks. Why? Because the automobile trucks in our country are competing with the railroads. One railroad president a short time ago appeared before a Senate committee and said he could not compete with the automobile and the trucks. That is largely true in my country. On a 25 or 30 mile haul they will not load a freight car, pay the freight, and unload it, but they will hire trucks and carry the freight in that way because they can do it cheaper. And one of the biggest railroad men in America, the highest-salaried railroad president in America, getting $120,000 a year, made the statement before a Senate committee that the railroads could not compete with automobile trucks. He was asked, "What are we to do for you?" And he said, "I think you ought to make these highways toll roads." Yes; let the people pay for the roads and then make them toll roads and pay for going over them, thus reducing the competition with the railroads and permitting the railroads to still hold up the people, if you please, in freight and passenger rates. And yet they come here in this report and want you to reduce the surtaxes, the high surtaxes levied on the rich, my friends, because they want those people to have money to lend to the railroads and to the public utilities.

The public utilities are in the same fix. The public utilities in St. Louis are now in the hands of a receiver, as is the case in many other cities of the country, not because they were not a paying investment, but because of the wreckers of those institutions, the wreckers of those big business institutions, wreckers who wanted to milk the corporations and let the people and taxpayers in the localities hold the bag, if you please.

Mr. TAGUE speaks in the same strain on the floor of the House, as reported on page 2592 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I want to direct the attention of every Member in this House to the railroad situation of this country. It can not be said that the condition of some of the railroads of the country to-day was caused by the war. It can not be said that their deplorable condition was caused by accident. It was rather the acts of unscrupulous men who robbed and plundered the treasuries of some of the railroads of this country for their own benefit.

I know whereof I speak. In my own State of Massachusetts, I served on the committee which investigated the theft of the capital of some of the railroads in New England. I also want to refer to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad scandal, to the Boston & Maine Railroad scandal, to the street-railway scandal, to the destruction of competing steamboat lines by the New Haven Railroad, and then ask yourselves why the people of these United States will not put their money into these securities. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, these are only a few of the exhibitions by these men in high finance that cause the people to hesitate before again trusting them with their savings. They took from the people of New England over $400,000,000 and drove the value of their securities in these railroads to practically nothing. Railroad stocks selling at over $200 a share are now selling at $13 a share; street-railroad lines and railroad companies in the hands of receivers; steamboat lines sold upon the market for practically nothing; and then these men come forward after their unscrupulous methods and say, "Give us more of the money of the people of this Nation that we may play with it."

Reference was made here to-day to the Rockefeller millions. It was men like Rockefeller and his associates who wrecked the Boston & Maine Railroad and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. For years Mr. Rockefeller played with the money of the people of this Nation, and when old age was coming and he thought he had played with the people's money long enough he took his earnings out of industry and stocks and placed it in nontaxable securities, where it could not be touched by the taxation system of the Government, which had protected him in all these years. I am not afraid of nontaxable securities. There will be a time when we will reach nontaxable securities, and the time is not far distant. When the railroads apply to the people of this Nation for more money, let me say that the people of the country have lost confidence in railroad stocks and bonds and will no longer take them.

We will have more investigations in time to come perhaps, and we will have exposés as we are having to-day at the other end of the Capitol; but, my friends, business will never be good, the people will never trust the men in high finance again, until they resort to different methods than those of deception, bribery, and corruption.

NOW, CLASS, SOME CALISTHENICS.

But by this time the class must be tired of the shock of fiercely contending humans, so let us taper off with some didactic "questions and answers" on vital points developed in the committee and House discussions:

Question. While the motor user pays large sums to the United States he receives back large sums in road construction. Does any other class get similar treatment?

Answer. Yes. The steel industry is given contracts for steel used in battleships, but is not called on to pay a special tax. The farmer does not pay a special tax for the work of the Department of Agriculture. There is always a special benefit to somebody out of every activity for the general good, but others are not compelled to pay discriminatory taxes as the moter user is.

Highways are public property and are used by all the public. They are only constructed by the Nation. They are maintained by the State and its subdivisions. The motorist pays for their maintenance through State and local taxes.

No class should be called upon to bear the cost of a general benefit and in no other case is a class called upon to do so.

Further, the Government does not award money for highway construction for the sole benefit of the motor user. Highway construction constitutes a general benefit in which all participate. It increases property valuations, provides for the national defense, facilitates the Postal Service, lowers the cost of transportation, makes possible better health, police, fire, and sanitation standards for farmer and city man alike, and promotes the welfare of the Nation through binding communities and States together.

The Government does not appropriate highway funds for the benefit of the motor user, but because the whole public demands them.

HEAVY MOTOR TRUCKS.

Question. The heavy motor truck damages the road; why should not it pay the tax?

Answer. Every State has laws for the protection of its highways against abuse. These laws should be enforced; and where they are, the trucks do not unduly damage the highways. Witness Maryland, Connecticut, and other Commonwealths, where stringent overloading laws are enforced. These laws should be enforced everywhere, and no one in the motor industry holds any brief for those who violate them.

The testimony of T. H. MacDonald, Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, before the Senate District Subcommittee on Traffic, set forth clearly that a load of 28,000 pounds is permissible under favorable weather conditions.

Regulatory laws exist. Will anyone say that the police can not enforce them?

The heavy motor truck is not used for pleasure. It is used only because of a public demand for transportation, and every cost added to its use must be paid for by the consumer. Examine the uses of the heavy vehicle, and it will be found transporting milk, meat, coal, building materials, and the other commodities essential to life. It is used only when it is cheaper than other forms of transport, or when it provides a transport which would not exist otherwise.

Its field is necessarily limited, but in its field it is indispensable.

GOOD MORNING, JUDGE.

Then come aluminum and other gougers on the component parts of the automobile, each predatory malefactor bending the back of the motorist still farther over his steering wheel.

Now I append a table showing some of the various gentry and interests which live off of and on and with the automotive industry. It is prepared by the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, published in the Detroit Free Press, under date of January 6, 1924, covering the commodities going into the manufacture of cars, such as iron and steel, aluminum, glass, and so forth. The clipping is as follows:

[From Detroit Free Press, January 6, 1924.]

Preliminary facts and figures of the automobile industry for 1923, by Alfred Reeves, general manager National Automobile Chamber of Commerce.

PRODUCTION.

Cars and trucks	4,014,000
Cars	3,644,000
Trucks	370,000
Previous record motor-vehicle production, 1922	2,659,064
Percentage increase over 1922	50
Production of closed cars	1,235,000
Per cent closed cars	35
Total wholesale value of cars	$2,243,385,000
Total wholesale value of trucks	$267,500,000
Total wholesale value of cars and trucks	$2,510,885,000
Tire production	45,000,000
Wholesale value of motor-vehicle tire business	$760,000,000
Total wholesale value of parts and accessories, exclusive of tires	$1,310,000,000
Average retail price of car, 1923	$811
Average retail price of truck, 1923	$1,080
Purchasing power of automobile dollar (1913=100)	$1.11
Number of persons employed in motor-vehicle and allied lines	2,750,000
Special Federal excise taxes paid to United States Government by automobile industry in 1923	$155,000,000

REGISTRATION.

Service stations and repair shops	67,802
Supply stores	65,988

HIGHWAYS.

The total amount paid into the United States Treasury from receipts on discriminatory motor taxes from 1917 to 1923, inclusive, was	$589,000,000
The total withdrawals from the United States Treasury for Federal highway aid from 1917 to 1923, inclusive, were	$264,800,000

Relation of highway withdrawals to motor payments, 45 per cent.

HARK! A FRIENDLY VOICE.

Statement of Secretary of Agriculture Henry C. Wallace:

The automobile revenues of the Government for the last fiscal year ended June 30, 1923, were, in round numbers, $146,000,000, and the withdrawals from the Treasury for Federal-aid highway purposes were approximately $72,000,000, which indicates clearly that the owners and operators of motor vehicles on our highways are bearing more than double the entire Federal expenditure for roads.

In a day or so I hope to show the slimy trail of oil across the motorist's windshield and into his pocketbook, as shown in the congressional struggle of two years ago.

TIME AND THE VOTER CORRECT ALL.

Let us close with the sovereign voter, his friends and relatives. The table shows his habitat, and all candidates for the House and Senate will surely give this at least one fleeting glance. It is taken from a standard auto journal, the Automotive Industries, issue of January 10, 1924, and is presumed to represent the latest compilation of figures on the subject. It is estimated that 4,000,000 new cars will be sold in 1924. Thus does the prolific motor voter multiply!

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the question of tax reduction is, of course, one of intense interest to everyone throughout the country. The bill under consideration is to amend and take the place of the revenue act of 1921, and has for its purpose to reduce and equalize taxes and to provide revenue.

The bill as originally introduced contained 344 printed pages. Almost every provision of the revenue act of 1921 is amended, either by additions or eliminations or changes of some kind, and there has been much misrepresentation as to the attitude of Members of Congress spread broadcast throughout the country by well-organized propaganda. A very large number of people were led to believe that the so-called Mellon plan and tax reduction were synonymous. For that reason many letters and telegrams were sent to Members of Congress, and resolutions were passed urging that the Representatives in Congress should support the so-called Mellon plan of tax reduction. The records show that this tax bill was introduced in the House of Representatives on February 7, 1924 (H. R. 6715), and was reported by the Ways and Means Committee on February 11, 1924, and the reported bill contained 242 pages. Of course, the public could not have known many of the provisions of the bill prior to that time.

The truth is that every Member of Congress was in favor of tax reduction, the only differences between them being as to the plan of reduction.

The Committee on Ways and Means reported the Mellon plan in sections 210 and 211 of the proposed bill.

Section 210 deals with the normal tax and it provides for the collection of a normal tax of 3 per cent of the net income upon the first $4,000 over and above the exemption of $1,000 allowed to a single person, and the exemption of $2,500 allowed to married persons whose incomes are less than $5,000, and 6 per cent on all the income in excess of that amount; and section 211 of the so-called Mellon, or Treasury plan, provides that a surtax shall be collected beginning with 1 per cent of the amount by which the net income exceeds $10,000, and does not exceed $12,000, and is graduated upward until 25 per cent is collected on the net income which exceeds $100,000. The difference between this so-called Mellon plan and the Democratic plan is:

First. The exemption of an unmarried person is raised from $1,000 to $2,000, and the exemption of married persons is raised from $2,500 to $3,000.

Second. The normal income-tax rate is 2 per cent on amounts of $5,000 and under, 4 per cent on amounts from $5,000 to $10,000, and 6 per cent on all amounts in excess of $10,000.

Third. The surtaxes levied under the Democratic plan begin with a 1 per cent surtax on all incomes between $12,000 and $14,000, and were graduated upward until 44 per cent was collected on all incomes between $92,000 and $94,000, and on all incomes above that amount. For convenient reference, and in order that the two plans may be compared, I am inserting herewith the surtax rates as proposed by the two plans and the Longworth substitute or compromise:

An examination of these plans shows that the Democratic plan relieves the small income-tax payer by, first, increasing the exemptions on single persons from $1,000 to $2,000, and upon married persons whose incomes are less than $5,000 from $2,500 to $3,000; second, reducing the normal taxes on the smaller incomes; and, third, increasing the exemptions upon which surtaxes are collected so as to begin at the rate of 1 per cent upon net incomes between $12,000 and $14,000, instead of beginning, as does the Mellon plan, at the rate of 1 per cent upon net incomes between $10,000 and $12,000; and the Democratic plan increases the income taxes collected upon those paying the higher incomes so as to collect 44 per cent on net incomes of $92,000 or more, whereas the Treasury or Mellon plan collects only 25 per cent on the higher net incomes of $100,000 or more.

Stating the matter in a different way and using the statistics of the year 1921, these being the last figures available, 6,662,176 persons made Federal income-tax returns in 1921. The Democratic plan will afford a greater reduction upon 6,652,833 persons making income-tax returns, while under the Treasury or Mellon plan only 9,343 persons will receive a greater reduction in their taxes than they would receive under the Democratic plan.

In my State of Oklahoma 69,381 persons made Federal income-tax returns in 1921. Of these, 69,349 persons will receive a greater reduction under the Democratic plan, whereas only 32 would receive a greater reduction under the Mellon or Treasury plan. In order that these figures may be available, I am inserting herewith a table showing numerical comparison of taxpayers by States for the year 1921, the latest available statistics from the Treasury Department, as follows:

[The first column of figures represents the number of persons in each State who paid Federal taxes in 1921; the second column represents those who will receive a greater reduction in their taxes under the Democratic plan than under the Mellon plan; and the third column represents those who will receive a greater reduction in their taxes under the Mellon plan than under the Democratic plan.]

When these figures are compared and analyzed, and the people are advised as to the difference between the two plans, I assert with great confidence that they will favor the adoption of the Democratic plan.

In order to assist in making a further comparison I am inserting a table showing comparative tax of married persons without dependents and the percentage of reduction under the Mellon and under the Democratic plans as compared with existing law, as follows:

The above table shows the amount of tax that would be collected under the present law, the amount that would be collected under the Mellon plan, and the saving to the taxpayers that would be effected under the Democratic plan.

Upon a vote in the House upon the two plans, the Mellon plan was rejected by a vote of 261 to 153, or by a majority of 108 votes. Sixty-two Republicans voted against the Mellon plan and in favor of the Democratic plan. The so-called compromise plan, introduced by the majority leader, Mr. LONGWORTH, does not materially differ from the Democratic plan. The principal differences are, first, the Longworth compromise plan does not raise the exemption upon individuals from $1,000 to $2,000, nor upon married persons from $2,500 to $3,000, as does the Democratic plan; second, it lowers the normal taxes, as does the Democratic plan, to 2 per cent upon the first $4,000, in excess of exemptions, and then it collects 5 per cent upon the next $4,000, and thereafter 6 per cent is the normal tax collected, whereas the Democratic plan imposes a normal income tax of 2 per cent on amounts of $5,000, 4 per cent on amounts from $5,000 to $10,000, and 6 per cent on the net incomes in excess of that amount; and, third, the compromise plan collects a surtax on net incomes between $10,000 and $12,000, whereas the Democratic plan begins imposing a surtax on net incomes between $12,000 and $14,000, and both plans graduate the surtax until 37½ per cent is collected in the highest brackets under the compromise plan upon net incomes of $200,000 or over, whereas the Democratic plan collects 44 per cent upon net incomes of $92,000 and over that amount.

There is no difference in principle between the plans, except as herein stated, between the Democratic plan and the compromise plan.

It is estimated that the raising of exemptions on incomes from $1,000 to $2,000 on single persons, and from $2,500 to $3,000 on married persons, would relieve about 800,000 persons from making returns, who are now required to make such returns, and would relieve from further taxes nearly 1,646,000 persons whose average taxes are under $12,000 each.

For convenient reference I am inserting the following comparative table showing amount of surtax under the existing law, Mellon plan, Democratic plan, and Longworth compromise plan:

TAX REDUCTION JUSTIFIED.

The Treasury Department, under date of November 10, 1923, advised that there would be a surplus of more than $300,000,000 for the present year. For the fiscal year 1923, ending on June 30, 1923, there was a surplus of $309,657,460.30, and it is estimated for the year 1924 there will be a surplus of $329,639,924, and for the fiscal year of 1925, $395,681,634.

It will be seen, therefore, that it was the plain duty of the Congress to relieve the people of these unnecessary tax burdens.

It is interesting to remember that when the adjusted compensation bill was passed by the last Congress the Treasury Department, in order to justify a presidential veto of that bill, estimated that there would be a deficit of approximately $650,000,000.

OTHER PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

There are, of course, many other provisions of the bill in addition to the income-tax provisions contained in sections 210 and 211.

The inheritance taxes were increased, and a tax on gifts imposed, and the excise taxes were either reduced or eliminated. The 2-cent tax on each $100 promissory note was repealed, as was the tax on theater admissions where the price of admission is 50 cents and under. A liberal exemption of $1,000 was allowed on automobiles, and a reduction from 5 per cent to 2½ per cent was made on automobile accessories. The administrative features were improved, in effect embodying in legislation many of the rules and regulations of the Treasury Department.

I really favor a larger reduction of excise taxes.

NECESSITY FOR STRICTEST ECONOMY.

In this connection permit me to repeat that the Congress should closely scrutinize every appropriation, and there should be the strictest economy in every branch of the Government. When money is appropriated it comes from the people and must be collected through taxation, direct and indirect. The people of the several States should, however, be reminded that most of the taxes which they pay, including ad valorem taxes and State income and other State taxes, are for local purposes to maintain their State governments, and for county, municipal, and educational purposes, and in this connection the people should be urged again to use the strictest economy against extravagant or unnecessary expenditures of all kinds. Their tax receipts will indicate for what purposes the taxes are collected.

HISTORY OF INCOME-TAX LEGISLATION.

The question of income-tax legislation as applied to the United States is an interesting one. The first income-tax law was enacted during the Civil War, on August 5, 1861, and amended July 1, 1862, and was repealed in 1872.

The next income-tax bill was enacted August 15, 1894, but was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Pollock case, on rehearing, May 20, 1895 (158 U. S. 601). This led to the proposal and adoption of the Sixteenth Amendment to the Constitution, as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.

which was declared to have been ratified in a proclamation dated February 25, 1913.

The first income-tax law under this amendment was enacted October 3, 1913, as subdivision 2 of the tariff act. Other income tax acts have been passed—in 1916, 1917, 1919, and 1921. Nearly all of the leading countries of the world at the present time raise a large part of their revenue to sustain their respective governments by an income tax. It is conceded to be the fairest tax that is levied. No tax, direct or indirect, is popular, but conceding that the Government is economically run, that there are no extravagances, and that a certain amount of money is absolutely necessary to pay the expenses of government, the income tax, with certain exemptions to exclude small incomes, and deductions for families and other purposes, is based upon the amount actually earned during any calendar year. It is a tax upon wealth, taking into consideration the ability of the taxpayer to pay. It is a fair and a just tax provided it is equitably distributed and provided, of course, that no more money is collected from the people of the country than is absolutely necessary to pay the expenses of the Government economically administered.

THE BUDGET SYSTEM.

I supported the Budget system and made a speech in its favor in the House on October 25, 1919.

The Congress should not increase expenditures not recommended, except for the most urgent needs of the Government.

President Wilson strongly urged the Budget system, as did Hon. John J. Fitzgerald and Hon. Swager Sherley, both Democratic chairmen of the House Committee on Appropriations, and Congress, during the Wilson administration, passed the bill, but President Wilson was compelled to veto it because an unconstitutional provision was incorporated in it as to the manner of removing the head of the bureau—the Comptroller General—by a joint resolution of Congress. The Department of Justice held that this provision was unconstitutional, and President Wilson, though strongly favoring Budget legislation, felt compelled to veto the bill and urged Congress to repass the bill with the above objection eliminated. The Republican Congress refused to act upon his recommendation and permitted the bill to go over into the succeeding Congress and then enacted it in order to claim the credit for it politically.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

In order to further aid in reducing appropriations I have introduced a constitutional amendment, which is pending before the Judiciary Committee, authorizing and empowering the President of the United States to veto separate items in an appropriation bill. The constitution of the State of Oklahoma has a similar provision. Many other State constitutions have like provisions. The governors of nearly all the States have indorsed this provision. Congress has heretofore been severely criticized for including questionable items in appropriation bills for local purposes. This provision would enable the President to veto any separate item in an appropriation bill. The only objection urged against it is the reluctance to add another amendment to the Constitution, but of course that is an objection that could be urged against any amendment to the Constitution.

EXPENDITURES ENORMOUSLY INCREASED.

The expenditures of the Government have of course increased from year to year, and in order that we may have for convenient reference the amount of such increases so that they may be compared year by year I am submitting herewith the expenditures made from the beginning of our Government down to the present time. These expenditures include the civil and miscellaneous expenses, War Department, including rivers and harbors, Panama Canal, Navy Department, Indians, pensions, postal deficiencies, interest on the public debt, as shown by the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, as follows:

Expenditures of the United States Government, by fiscal years, from 1791 to 1923.

1923	3,647,647,849

Let me emphasize that the above expenditures do not include the amounts annually expended for the Postal Service but do include the amounts appropriated for postal deficits.

Contrast the expenditure of $4,269,027 for the first 15 months of Washington's administration with the expenditure of $3,647,647,849 appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.

The revenues received by our Government, from all sources, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, were as follows:

Ordinary receipts.	Fiscal year 1923.	Corresponding period fiscal year 1922.
Customs	$561,928,866.66	$356,443,387.18
Internal revenue:
Income and profits tax	1,678,607,428.22	2,088,128,192.68
Miscellaneous internal revenue	945,865,332.61	1,145,125,094.11
Miscellaneous receipts:
Proceeds Government-owned securities—
Foreign obligations—
Principal	31,636,907.64	48,673,554.63
Interest	204,332,247.86	26,548,513.03
Railroad securities	69,297,348.01
All others	46,301,371.60	26,079,128.49
Trust-fund receipts (reappropriated for investment)	26,602,670.00	42,113,487.75
Proceeds sale of surplus property	91,706,388.29	118,606,798.68
Panama Canal tolls, etc	17,271,855.23	11,747,092.47
Receipts from miscellaneous sources credited direct to appropriations	65,911,405.40
Other miscellaneous	240,333,648.32	270,638,990.92
Total	4,037,135,489.36	4,109,104,136.94

This table shows the amount, and from the sources collected, of all money received by the Federal Government for the above period, but does not include postal receipts of $532,827,925.09. The postal receipts added to the above amounts of revenue collected makes a grand total of $4,641,932,076.03.

THE FOREIGN DEBT.

Our Federal taxes could be further reduced, provided all of our foreign loans were funded and the interest and amortized payments regularly paid. The Treasury Department reported, under date of December 3, 1923, the following advances heretofore made on account of purchase of obligations of foreign governments:

Countries.	Credits established.	Cash advanced.	Other charges against credits.	Balance under established credits.
Belgium	$249,214,467.89	$249,214,467.89
Cuba	10,000,000.00	10,000,000.00
Czechoslovakia	67,329,041.10	61,974,041.10		$5,355,000.00
France	2,997,477,809.00	2,997,477,809.00
Great Britain	4,277,000,000.00	4,277,000,000.00
Greece	48,236,622.05	15,000,000.00	$33,235,622.05
Italy	1,648,684,650.90	1,648,684,650.90
Liberia	26,000.00	26,000.00
Rumania	25,000,000.00	25,000,000.00
Russia	187,729,750.00	187,729,750.00
Serbia	26,780,465.56	26,780,465.56
Total	9,639,823,204.50	9,593,236,575.45	33,236,629.05	5,355,000.00

Of these amounts the indebtedness of Great Britain has been funded.

There have also been some payments of comparatively small amounts on the above obligations but not sufficient to pay the interest thereon, and hence the amount due, principal and interest, is in excess of the above amounts.

Under date of December 3, 1923, the Treasury Department reports repayments on account of the principal of obligations of foreign governments purchased by the United States have been made as follows:

Belgian Government	$2,003,659.21
Cuban Government	10,000,000.00
French Government	64,212,568.04
British Government	202,181,641.56
Rumanian Government	1,794,180.48
Serbian Government	720,600.16
Italian Government	37,000.74
Total	280,949,650.19

The Republic of Finland recently funded an indebtedness due and owing our Government of approximately $9,000,000, upon the same terms and conditions as the British loan was funded, dividing it into 62 annual payments, the entire amount bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent, payable semiannually, for the first 10 years, and 3½ per cent per annum thereafter.

Our World War Foreign Debt Commission, created by the act of Congress of February 9, 1922, as amended by the act of February 28, 1923, has made diligent effort to secure the funding of the obligations of the other foreign nations.

I favor the collection of every dollar of the entire foreign indebtedness, both principal and interest, and the remission of none of it. Congress should insist upon this commission urging the funding of this foreign indebtedness at the earliest possible moment, and to that end I favor a resolution expressing the impatience of Congress with the delays encountered by our commission, and if, after a reasonable time, say, June 30, 1925, the indebtedness is not funded, I would favor severing diplomatic relations with any foreign country declining, failing, or refusing to pay either the interest and principal due to our Government or funding the same in an acceptable manner. There can be no excuse given why this indebtedness should not be funded at an early date. The armistice was signed more than five years ago and the people of the United States are justified in expecting the representatives of our Government to see to it that the indebtedness due from foreign governments is funded and the interest and amortized payments be met so that our Government may, with certainty, anticipate the amounts to be paid, and the dates when they are to be paid, and to that extent our people may be relieved of taxes. I do not believe that such a resolution by Congress would embarrass our commission, or any other representative of our Government, but would strengthen them in urging an early funding of this foreign indebtedness.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the proposal of President Coolidge to reduce Federal taxes touched a responsive chord. Everybody wants the tax burden lifted as much as possible. The Democrats are resorting to every sort of trick and device in their efforts to convince the American people that they will be responsible for the tax reduction. They want to claim the credit. They will not be able to fool the people. There could be no tax reduction at this time but for the wise and economical conduct of the Nation's business by the Republican administration for the last three years.

NATION'S DEBT, $27,000,000,000.

When the Democrats went into power in 1913 the Nation's debt was about $1,000,000,000. Before they went out of power, through waste and extravagance and the World War they had increased the Nation's debt to nearly $27,000,000,000. It was increased 27 times. Since the Republicans got into control of Congress and the executive branch of the Government, this debt has been steadily decreased. It is now less than $22,000,000,000. Federal taxes reached their highest point in all of our history under the Wilson administration. The war closed November 11, 1918, yet these heavy war-time taxes were still in full force when President Harding took office March 4, 1921.

DEMOCRATIC WASTE AND EXTRAVAGANCE.

Much of the increase of our national debt and Federal taxes was due to the wanton waste and reckless extravagance of the last administration. The Wilson administration spent in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919, over $18,544,879,955, and only four and one-half months of that period was war. They spent in one year nearly five times as much as it cost the Union in four years of Civil War. They spent for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1920, about $7,000,000,000, nearly twice as much as the cost of four years of Civil War. This sum would pay the soldiers' bonus in cash five times. We can readily see why the heavy war taxes were kept in force until the Democrats went out of office.

THE REPUBLICANS REDUCED TAXES.

When President Harding assumed office March 4, 1921, he found all of the high war taxes still in effect. In cooperation with a Republican Congress he inaugurated a policy of the strictest economy. The Budget bill was promptly passed by Congress and signed by the President. This law placed the affairs of our Government upon a business basis and has saved hundreds of millions of dollars annually. The Army was greatly reduced and placed on a peace-time basis, thereby saving other millions of dollars. President Harding called the naval disarmament conference of the leading naval powers of the world and proposed that the competition in naval armaments cease, that no new battleships be built for 10 years, and that many of the battleships now in use be scrapped. The naval powers of the world adopted the President's suggestions, and in this way saved hundreds of millions of dollars to the American taxpayers; thousands of useless offices were abolished and thousands of useless job holders were let out. Because of these economies and wise administration of the Nation's affairs, the Harding administration spent $2,000,000,000 less the first year than had been spent by the Democrats the last year that they were in power. The Republican Congress in 1921 passed a tax-reduction bill which was promptly signed by President Harding. This reduced the tax burden of the American people nearly $1,000,000,000 annually.

REPUBLICAN SURPLUS VERSUS DEMOCRATIC DEFICIT.

Until the very day President Wilson retired from office, we had the highest Federal taxes in the history of this country, and our debt and deficit constantly increasing. Since the Republicans came into power, the national debt, which was nearly $27,000,000,000 is now less than $22,000,000,000. We have greatly reduced the Federal taxes. So effective has been the economy practiced by the Republican administration, we find a surplus in the Treasury of over $300,000,000, and we find that this sum or more will be saved annually to the people. It was this magnificent surplus in the Treasury that led President Coolidge recently to urge Congress to further reduce taxes. We have before us the amazing spectacle of two tax reductions in less than three years, and the national debt reduced billions of dollars. When the Democrats found that there was a surplus, they came forward with much noise and bluster and insisted that they tell the Congress how the taxes should be reduced. The country still remembers that they had eight years of control of this Government, but there was no surplus at any time, and was none when they went out of power. They had increased the taxes to the highest point in all our history. They had increased the Nation's debt from $1,000,000,000 to $27,000,000,000. The Democrats have proved themselves to be experts in tax increases and debt increases and without experience in tax reductions and debt reductions. It was the wise leadership of the Republicans that made a tax reduction possible in 1921, and that makes another tax reduction possible in 1924. The country certainly can trust the Republicans to grant all the reductions possible under the circumstances and to pass a law that is fair and just to all the people.

MELLON, GARNER, AND LONGWORTH PLANS.

There are three plans before the House. The so-called Mellon plan was submitted by Secretary Mellon. The Garner plan is backed by the Democrats. The Longworth plan was submitted as a compromise by the Republican floor leader LONGWORTH. There is no doubt but what Secretary Mellon is one of the very great financial experts of the country, and one of the very greatest Secretaries of the Treasury. Much of the Mellon plan has been agreed to by both Democrats and Republicans. The difference of opinion arises on the income taxes, inheritance taxes, and gift taxes. A majority of the House does not agree with Secretary Mellon on these propositions.

FAVORS THE RICH.

The objection to that part of the Mellon plan dealing with the income taxes, inheritance taxes, and gift taxes was that in the opinion of many it favored too much the people of very great wealth with very large incomes. It proposes to reduce the income taxes of Rockefeller, Ford, Morgan, and others of like wealth 50 per cent, or one-half of what they pay under the present law, while it reduces the taxes of persons of small incomes about 30 per cent. The Mellon plan, after the deduction of exemption, fixes the rate of normal tax at 3 per cent on incomes up to $4,000, and fixes the rate at 6 per cent on normal taxes on all incomes above $4,000. The Longworth plan after deduction of exemptions fixes the normal tax rate at 2 per cent on incomes up to $4,000 and 5 per cent on incomes between $4,000 and $8,000 and 6 per cent on all incomes above $8,000. The tax on incomes up to $4,000 is, under the Longworth plan, only two-thirds of what it is under the Mellon plan. The normal tax on incomes between $4,000 and $8,000 under the Longworth plan is only five-sixths of what it would be under the Mellon plan.

There is little difference between the rates fixed in the Garner plan and in the Longworth plan for the normal tax on moderate incomes. The Longworth plan is a great saving to the man of moderate income over the Mellon plan. To show what a substantial reduction is given to people of moderate incomes between the Longworth plan and the present law, I submit the following: The tax on incomes of $4,000 and less is reduced 62 per cent; on $5,000, 59 per cent; on $6,000, 55 per cent; on $7,000, 53 per cent; on $8,000, 52 per cent; on $9,000, 40 per cent, and above $9,000, 25 per cent. I am referring to the normal taxes. Under the Longworth plan the income taxes of at least nine-tenths of the income-tax payers of Kentucky will be reduced one-half of what they are under the present law. The Mellon plan proposes a great reduction in the surtaxes. A surtax is imposed in addition to the normal tax. Under the present law the surtax goes as high as 50 per cent. This applies to persons of very large incomes. Mr. Mellon proposes to cut the surtax on big incomes to 25 per cent, the Garner plan to 44 per cent, and the Longworth plan to 37½ per cent. Under the Longworth plan the surtax begins with the incomes of $10,001 at 1½ per cent, and continues upward to 37½ per cent on incomes of $200,000 and over. That is to say, a person whose income is over $10,000 and does not exceed $12,000 will pay a normal tax of 6 per cent and surtax of 1½ per cent. A person whose income is $25,000 will pay the normal tax of 6 per cent and a surtax of 8 per cent. Persons whose incomes are $200,000 or more will pay a normal tax of 6 per cent and a surtax of 37½ per cent.

The Government must always have sufficient revenue to operate the Government. The Longworth plan will produce sufficient revenue for this purpose, but it is shown that the Garner plan would create a deficit in the Treasury of more than $300,000,000 annually. The Longworth plan will give a much greater tax reduction to something like 4,000,000 income-tax payers than the Mellon plan would give to them.

While the Longworth plan would give less reduction to about 10,000 of the very large income-tax payers than the Mellon plan would give to them. We think that the Longworth plan is eminently fair, both to the small taxpayer and to the large taxpayer. It seems that the Republicans can get together on the Longworth plan, but not on the Mellon plan. I favor the Longworth plan.

INHERITANCE TAX.

A matter about which there is a sharp difference of opinion is the so-called estate tax or inheritance tax. The Mellon plan fixes a rate of 1 per cent of the net estate not in excess of $50,000 and range upward to 25 per cent on the net estate that exceed $10,000,000. We have a great war debt and it will soon cost this Government $1,000,000,000 annually to take care of the soldiers and sailors and their dependents. Many of the very large fortunes were created by the World War. This war debt must be paid and these defenders must be taken care of. We feel that instead of turning over all of these great estates to the heirs a proper share should be returned to the Government to meet our war debt and to take care of our defenders. Instead of a maximum rate of 25 per cent, I favor—and a majority of the House, I am sure, favors—the amendment offered by Mr. RAMSEYER. This amendment fixes the maximum of rate on these great estates at 40 per cent. If any man should leave a net estate of $100,000,000, under this amendment $40,000,000 would go to the Government as taxes.

It is a notorious fact that many of the people of great wealth of this country are dodging their just proportion of the tax burden. It is anticipated that if this tax should become a law, that many persons of great wealth would give away a large part of their estates in their lifetime, and in that way their estates would avoid the payment of this inheritance tax.

To avoid this, Chairman GREEN, of the Ways and Means Committee, has offered an amendment to tax all gifts of $50,000 or more to relatives at the same rate fixed for inheritance taxes, so that people of great wealth, if they should give away their estate, will be required to contribute a substantial sum to the Government. It is said that the inheritance tax will provide sufficient money to take care of the soldiers' bonus. It is unnecessary to say that the persons of great wealth have vigorously fought the high surtaxes, the inheritance tax, and the gift tax.

TWENTY-FIVE PER CENT REDUCTION NOW.

There is now more than $300,000,000 surplus in the Treasury. The taxes for 1923 will soon be due and payable. This bill amends the Mellon plan by granting a 25 per cent refund on the taxes payable this year. Most taxpayers will have paid at least a part of their Federal taxes before this bill can become a law. In such event this 25 per cent refund will be allowed on the subsequent payment or on the balance due this year. This measure, likewise, repeals many of the so-called nuisance taxes and excise taxes. This will become effective 30 days on and after the passage of this bill. This measure gives substantial relief to all classes of taxpayers in the Nation and gives most relief to those least able to pay, and gives the least relief to those most able to carry the burden.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make more clear my recent remarks that the automobile industry and its customers have been and are the prey of predatory interests working through Government agencies. The main purpose in doing this is to further my campaign, conducted through the past few months with great intensity, to educate the motorist as to the impositions placed upon him and to arouse still further automobile organizations and friendly associations to oppose such gouging.

For many years men who know what they want and who wish to increase still further their enormous wealth, who get more and more selfish, avaricious, and unscrupulous as they get richer, have been sticking their fingers, their agents, and their agencies, into Government to plunder unsuspecting American citizens.

These men have strangle holds upon the basic necessities of life, such as oil, metals, cotton and wool, foods, transportation, etc.

One of the passing strange facts of big business is that a comparatively new industry, one of the grandest contributions to the happiness and the betterment of mankind and now one of the prime necessities of life, has never tried to manipulate Government to its own selfish aggrandizement. Stranger still, it has not intelligently and effectively tried to protect itself from aggressive combinations which "picked" on it and aimed to rob it blind.

That crooked big business has been manipulating government on a gigantic scale to the detriment of the common good is now patent to the American people. The slimy trail of oil, as revealed in the United States Senate investigations in the most stupendous scandals of American history, has opened the minds of the people to a condition which has been chronic for some time.

ASSASSINS GIVE PROTECTION.

A friend of President Garfield told me recently that Garfield had determined to make a thoroughgoing exposé of crooked business using Government to defraud the people. His experience in Ohio and in Washington had given him the facts. But an assassins' bullet, the furious rage of a disappointed office seeker, struck him down in the Pennsylvania Railroad depot in Washington before he could open the eyes of the people.

It is generally known that President McKinley, himself the framer of a tariff law when in Congress, had intended to attack predatory wealth using Government when he, too, was struck down by an assassin's bullet in Buffalo, where he had gone to make a keynote speech on the relations of business and government.

But before Presidents Roosevelt and Wilson were stricken with ruptured blood vessels in the brains, which could not withstand the terrific strain of their labors for the people, labors mainly directed against crooked big business and crooked national and international interests, they carried their message to the people and put crooked big business on the defensive. But the "malefactors of great wealth" came back strong in the present administration.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, said not many days ago in the Senate that the important thing about the Teapot Dome scandal is the revelation "in successful operation" of that heretofore intangible thing called by Theodore Roosevelt "invisible government" and by Woodrow Wilson the "invisible empire."

He describes in the Senate, in more incisive and luminous language than I could, this "thing," and I quote from him:

That it existed intelligent and progressive people have long affirmed; that it succeeds in shaping legislation, in directing political policies, and in securing appointments from administrative officials has been freely asserted.

Those who heretofore were reluctant to believe can no longer challenge or deny its existence.

Invisible government, the curse of American politics for nearly half a century, has baffled the progress of our free institutions; it has repeatedly nullified the solemn verdict of the people recorded at the ballot box. Surreptitiously it purchases the talents of men of influence in all political parties to espouse and promote its greedy and selfish ends. It supports corrupt, not party, politics.

If it can not control, it purchases or seeks to destroy the press that dares to oppose it. It invades even the pulpit.

It knows neither Democrat nor Republican. It writes into political platforms meaningless phrases to cajole the voters.

It knows only one party—the party in power. Its objective is to win the approval and sanction of those in authority. It discards its victims when they are out of power with Neronian mercilessness.

The backers of this paralyzing influence in government, disclosed in the present scandal, have been bolder and more brazen since wealth formed itself into great organizations of unchecked greed and selfishness to control and exploit the natural resources of the Nation and gouge the unorganized masses of this country.

These concession and privilege seekers yield to the popular government only when they must to stem defeat. They have successfully opposed humane and progressive legislation for years and have granted the people their rights only when the people have overthrown them.

Mr. President, the present situation demands patriotic, nonpartisan action. These disclosures are in vain if they do not stir us to a realization of the absolute necessity, if we are to preserve democratic institutions and maintain the confidence of the people in the Republic, to rid our political parties and this Government of these sinister influences.

How strange that the automotive industry, regarded by many as most typical in its origin and development of American genius in business, should not have properly protected itself against the "invisible government"!

The industry which taught the world high speed, high wages, quantity production, and revolutionized not only business but the everyday life of nearly every human being in the United States at least is caught napping by other businesses at the oldest game in the world, the use of government to despoil.

If by my campaign of the past few months, a gruelling contest which brought many bruises and some scars, I could awaken the automobile world of America to get out and be men and defend themselves, to use their strength and their brains, not for spoliation but for loyal defense of their customers, I would not deem my efforts to be in vain.

These customers who have helped to build up the most stupendous fortunes the world has ever known deserve that protection. That their cause is just was recognized by the House when it voted unanimously, at a time when the Budget was in danger, to strike $24,000,000 in taxes off the motorists of the country. But that was only after Ways and Means had given the motorists the marble heart and the appeal had been carried to the country with tens of thousands of telegrams and letters and bulletins.

That was only after "pitiless publicity" had been remorselessly administered, only after the spigot had been turned on and the bung yanked out. It certainly was glorious to see some of my colleagues run to cover and scores of them rush for the auto bandwagon and make a flying leap for the upper deck.

On Tuesday, February 26, that red-letter day for the 15,000,000 motorists of the country, when the fever for auto-tax reduction, precipitated the wildest mêlée seen on the floor of the House in many a day and when fist fights were threatened, I left the floor as the session broke up in disorder to meet representatives of automotive organizations in the corridor.

TURNING ON THE PUBLICITY.

They were white faced and alarmed.

"Has our cause been hurt?" they asked me.

"Not at all; you are just getting to the country with a vengeance," I replied. "That fracas will break on the front page of every live newspaper in the country. The press associations always carry a fist fight on the House floor near or 100 per cent. You could not get your cause on the front pages of newspapers for a million dollars. Now you get position for nothing and the motorist will be awakened to the fact that a battle is being waged for him. You spent hundreds of dollars for telegrams to your people. Here is a gift of million-dollar publicity gratis."

That was true. The most alert and brainiest newspaper in the country, so far as news gathering is concerned, carried the story for three and a half columns and flew the pennant on the front page. That was the New York Times. Thousands of other papers carried the story. Then followed the aftermath of editorials.

Yet I have been accused of endangering the automobile cause by starting that row on the floor of the House. I do aver and affirm that I was not wholly responsible for that fracas, and I fed the raw meat with no conscious intention of starting a mêlée whose outcome would be problematical.

To illustrate the point that the automotive industry must protect itself against bold and unscrupulous aggressors, I now cite the fight of the American Automobile Association two years ago in Congress against oil. This, of course, was before the methods of oil were known to the country and before Teapot Dome was on every lip.

The Dome revelations show that predatory oil was working particularly hard two years ago—all the various combinations of oil were working—working on the public and on one another, for oil, like little fishes and big fishes of the deep, is predacious and cannabilistic.

Oil was going so powerful in Ways and Means that it smashed down the automobile organizations. Flushed with victory and going strong, it came onto the floor of the House, eager to administer the knock-out to a groggy foe and collect the purse—winner take all.

It took the President of the United States, Mr. Harding, to turn the tide of battle. It took a violent blow at the constitutional independence of the legislative and executive functions of the Federal Government to stop oil. But President Harding did not hesitate to write a strong letter, in which he said that he "should be more than disappointed if Congress decided to levy a tariff on imported oil."

He put his interference on patriotic grounds "and the foreign policy to which we are already committed."

In view of Teapot Dome revelations as to how far oil had gotten into the President's Cabinet, his attitude in the crisis of two years is pertinent and important.

In this crisis the old guard of Ways and Means wanted to levy a tariff of 35 cents a barrel on oil and even threatened $1.50 per barrel. This meant a tax of about $140,000,000 on the motorists of the country. It probably meant raising the price of gasoline alone from 3 to 7 cents per gallon.

I sincerely hope one of the fights of the near future of the automotive organizations will be against the present high prices of oil and gasoline. That is a duty. It should be a pleasure.

Oil is persistent. Beaten in the House, through an appeal to the country and the bludgeon of the President of the United States, it took the fight nevertheless to the Senate Finance Committee and to the floor of the Senate. Oil knows not how to surrender and always comes back strong. Fortunately it was beaten both in Senate committee and on Senate floor. But it is still gouging the automotive industry.

This contest of two years ago is so illuminating that I give more of the facts as set forth in the statements of the American Automobile Association, and I give a fuller excerpt of President Harding's letter of July 13, 1921, to Chairman Fordney on proposed tariff on crude and fuel oil.

The battle is also waged against the proposed asphalt tariff as a hindrance to the good-roads movement which the automotive interests have built up and fostered.

The following appeal was sent to the country by the American Automobile Association on July 9, 1921, through the club secretaries:

The Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives recently included in the tariff bill reported to the House a schedule on crude oil amounting to 35 cents per barrel. This amounts to about 100 per cent ad valorem in addition to the export duty of 113 per cent now imposed by the Mexican Government, the chief source of petroleum imported into this country.

Our consumption of petroleum products exceeds our domestic production by about 66,000,000 barrels annually. Our imports of petroleum are valued at about $90,000,000 annually, yet our exports of refined petroleum products amount to about $549,000,000 annually.

If this tariff prevails, it will enable and encourage foreign countries to monopolize foreign supplies of petroleum. At present we are supplying the world with two-thirds of its petroleum products notwithstanding the fact that we have only one-sixth of the world's resources.

Petroleum is one of our greatest natural resources. It is both definitely limited and rapidly diminishing. A tariff on oil therefore places a premium on the rapid depletion of this great natural resource.

The American people are the largest users of petroleum in the world. It is estimated that 83 per cent of the motor vehicles of the entire earth are found in the United States. Yet less than 17 per cent of the world's resources of petroleum is situated within the United States.

Sixty per cent of all the asphaltic materials used in the United States for road building and roofing purposes are imported from Mexico. If this tariff on petroleum finally prevails, it would therefore seriously interfere with the present road-building program of the country.

In view of these facts the American Automobile Association, in annual convention assembled in Washington, May 16 and 17, passed a resolution of protest against any provisions being included in the tariff measure on petroleum. The executive committee of the A. A. A. on Wednesday, July 6, voted in opposition to the 35-cent tariff on crude oil, and authorized notices to be sent to club secretaries urging them to ask their Representatives in Congress to oppose this tariff.

A vote will be taken on this schedule about the 21st of this month. You and the members of your club are therefore urgently requested to communicate by letter or by wire, if necessary, with your Representatives in the House protesting against this schedule.

We will keep you in touch with what happens in the House and later on it may be desirable to communicate with your Senators on this subject when the tariff bill reaches the Senate. Please supply us with copies of any replies you may receive from Members of Congress on this subject.

AMERICAN AUTOMOBILE ASSOCIATION.

Then follows the excerpt from the letter of President Harding to Chairman Fordney, of Ways and Means:

I can not refrain from expressing the hope that your committee will take note of the foreign policy to which we are already committed, under which the Government is doing every consistent thing to encourage the participation of American citizens in the development of oil resources in many foreign lands.

This course has been inspired by the growing concern of our country over the supply of crude oil to which we may turn for our future needs, not alone for our domestic commerce but in meeting the needs of our Navy and our merchant marine.

To levy a protective tariff on crude petroleum now would be at variance with all that has been done to safeguard our future interests. I can readily recognize the claim of some oil producers for a protective tariff on their product, but such a course of temporary relief would be so thoroughly out of harmony with the larger policy which I have had in mind that I should be more than disappointed if Congress decided to levy a tariff on imported oil.

The oil industry is so important to our country, and our future is so utterly dependent upon an abundance of resources rather than temporary profit to a few producers who feel the pinch of Mexican competition. I thank you very sincerely for your considerate attitude in the matter. (Printed in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 13, 1921.)

The contest is carried to the Senate and the A. A. A. sent the following letter to all Senators. I give it because it presents some new facts and appeals:

MY DEAR SENATOR: In protesting against the tariff on petroleum we represent the interests and the wishes of more than 10,000,000 owners of automobiles. We likewise represent the interests of the half million owners of tractors, and the interests of 2,500,000 owners of stationary engines are also involved, as well as those of 46,000,000 consumers of artificial gas. The American merchant marine's desperate struggle for existence would be rendered hopeless by the imposition of this duty. Such a duty would scuttle our ships. It would devour the proposed subsidy. "Don't give up the ship."

Last, but not least, we would protest on behalf of those who are promoting and providing for the construction and maintenance of improved highways. Hundreds of millions of dollars are annually expended by community, county, State, and Nation on our system of public highways. The tariff on oil would increase the cost. It would be a tariff on travel and transportation.

In protesting the duty on oil we stand on the traditional policy of our Government. No Congress, no party has ever imposed a tariff on petroleum.

In protesting this duty we stand on the announced policy of the national administration. When this duty was under discussion in the House, the President addressed a letter to Chairman Fordney, in which he expressed the hope that a tariff would not be imposed on oil, and declared that "to levy a protective tariff on crude petroleum now would be at variance with all that has been done to safeguard our future interests." In accord with this enlightened policy, the House defeated the proposed tariff by a vote of 2 to 1. This vote was taken July 21, last year. Since that date the price of oil in the United States has increased 100 per cent. At times it has been considerably more than 100 per cent. Since that vote the price of the leading oil stocks has increased from 50 to 100 per cent. Certain stocks at certain times have shown an advance of 150 per cent. These prices have increased notwithstanding an enormous increase in domestic production.

The Senate Finance Committee, pursuing this enlightened policy, defeated the proposed duty on petroleum by a vote that was almost unanimous. It would seem to be doubly undesirable to depart from this policy at the present juncture. The coal situation would seem to be critical enough without laying a tariff on the only other available fuel.

It is earnestly to be hoped that the Senate, following the example of the Finance Committee, the House of Representatives, and the President, will oppose the imposition of a tariff on crude and fuel oils. It is earnestly to be hoped that the Senate will not disregard the wishes and sacrifice the interests of so many millions of American citizens when that sacrifice is entirely unnecessary, as evidenced by the enhanced price of oil stocks and the enhanced price of oil itself. Indeed, the oil producers of California adopted resolutions protesting against the oil tariff, and a referendum vote among the producers of the mid-continent field stood 90 for the tariff and 47 against the tariff.

It would be passing strange if the Senate of the United States should vote to increase the price of petroleum and its products while a committee of the Senate is investigating the prevailing high prices of petroleum and its product.

Most respectfully submitted.

DAI H. LEWIS,
Acting Executive Chairman.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to register my opposition to Title IX of the pending revenue bill, which seeks to create a board of tax appeals of not less than 7 nor more than 28 men, fixing their term of office at 10 years and carrying a salary to each of $10,000 per year. I favor striking this provision from the bill entirely, and if the House refuses to do this, I favor an amendment reducing the salary of the members of this board to not exceeding $7,500 per annum. I also favor an amendment providing that the appointment of the members of this board of tax appeals be submitted to and approved by the Senate like all other presidential appointments. Under our scheme of government, nominations for Cabinet positions, Federal judges, postmasters, appointments to the Diplomatic Service, and the principal appointments in practically every branch of our Government must be submitted by the President to and approved by the Senate. I can see no good reason why the appointment of the members of this board of tax appeals should not be submitted to and approved by the Senate as other appointments. Certainly the people of this Nation are interested in who shall serve on this board.

I am confident that the Senate will not act arbitrarily or refuse to confirm an appointment unless it appears from an investigation that the appointee is incapable or unworthy. This board of tax appeals, if created, will pass in review on questions involving hundreds of millions of dollars annually, and the appointments should not be left exclusively to the judgment of the President or Secretary of the Treasury.

We are now passing through a period of economic distress in the United States. In many occupations the earnings are too meager to insure even a moderate profit. This is particularly true among the small tradesmen and those engaged in moderate business activities. Among the agricultural classes there is a nation-wide distress, the inevitable result of the inability of the farmer to sell his commodities at a price that will yield even the cost of production. The national debt is a tremendous burden, amounting now to approximately $22,000,000,000, while the indebtedness of the 48 States and political subdivisions thereof is in excess of $10,000,000,000, making the total public debt over $32,000,000,000. To meet the interest on this debt a tremendous tax burden is inevitable.

The last 30 years have witnessed a tremendous increase in the expenses of government, State and municipal. The Federal Government and the 48 State governments have been in a mad race to see which could create the largest number of new offices, bureaus, and commissions. Each year the number of State and Federal officeholders is enlarged and the salaries increased, until the tax burdens have become almost unbearable.

Prior to the war the combined cost of all our State and Federal Governments was only about $2,000,000,000 annually. Now it amounts to about $7,000,000,000 per annum, or about three and one-half times the pre-war cost of government. This phenomenal increase can be met in but one way, and that is by taxation. I plead for more economy in the management of our public affairs.

It seems to me that the time has come for our Federal Government to inaugurate a policy of retrenchment, reform, and economy in public affairs. The Government, State and National, have no money except what they collect in the form of taxes from the people. If the Government makes extravagant appropriations, pays excessive salaries, and maintains an army of unnecessary employees, then there will be an ever-increasing burden of taxation. It is time to stop, look, and listen before we create this new bureau, which will rapidly expand into a great army of clerks, auditors, inspectors, stenographers, and miscellaneous employees, meaning a tremendous additional tax burden on the American people.

We can never reduce the cost of government if we continue to create new offices and endow these offices with princely salaries.

There is, in my opinion, no worth-while demand for the creation of this board. The work these 28 men will do is now being done by employees in the Treasury Department whose salaries are around $5,000 per annum, none in excess of $7,500. If this provision stays in the bill these 28 offices will probably be filled by the men now performing this same work in the Treasury Department at salaries ranging from $5,000 to $7,500 per annum. In other words, the Government will get the same service it is getting now, but will pay each member of the board $10,000 annually instead of the much smaller salaries now being paid for the same service. The members of this board will hold office for a term of 10 years, during which each will draw a salary of $10,000 per annum, aggregating $100,000 for the 10-year term for each member. This means that the salaries of these 28 men will be $280,000 annually. In addition they are allowed by this bill $10 per day for expenses when their duties call them from their designated stations.

If this board is created, in a very few years it will have surrounded itself with an army of several thousand employees and subordinates. If Congress is determined to create this board of appeals, then the salaries of the members should be reduced to not exceeding $7,500 per annum. This reduction would mean a saving of $70,000 annually, or $700,000 in 10 years. I believe this can be done without impairing the efficiency of the board.

There is but one way to reduce tax burdens, and that way is to begin now to reduce the expenses of the Government and rigidly follow this rule in all matters relating to public expenditures except in the few cases where efficiency in the public service justifies and demands an increase. We accomplish nothing and get nowhere if while we talk economy we continue to create new offices and increase salaries of men who sit in swivel chairs in Washington and allot themselves more than their just proportion of the funds appropriated to carry on our Government. Capable men are not so scarce that we have to pay a salary of $10,000 per year to get efficient men to perform this service.

Let us begin to economize here and now and not put off until to-morrow what should be done to-day. If we once fix these salaries at $10,000 per annum, it is not probable that they will ever be reduced. So I favor reducing them now.

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, my attention was recently called to an unjust discrimination in the assessment of a tax on college fraternities by virtue of section 801 of the revenue act of 1921. This section is incorporated in section 501 of the revenue act of 1924 and reads as follows:

SEC. 501. On and after the date this title takes effect there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, in lieu of the taxes imposed by section 801 of the revenue act of 1921, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of any amount paid on or after such date, for any period after such date, (a) as dues or membership fees (where the dues or fees of an active resident annual member are in excess of $10 per year) to any social, athletic, or sporting club or organization; or (b) as initiation fees to such a club or organization, if such fees amount to more than $10, or if the dues or membership fees (not including initiation fees) of an active resident annual member are in excess of $10 per year, such taxes to be paid by the person paying such dues or fees: Provided, That there shall be exempted from the provisions of this section all amounts paid as dues or fees to a fraternal society, order, or association operating under the lodge system. In the case of life memberships, a life member shall pay annually, at the time for the payment of dues by active resident annual members, a tax equivalent to the tax upon the amount paid by such a member, but shall pay no tax upon the amount paid for life membership.

By virtue of the section just quoted a tax of 10 per cent on dues and initiation fees is assessed against members of any "social, athletic, or sporting club or organization." Under the proviso to this same section, however, the dues and fees paid to any fraternal society, orders, or associations are exempt from taxation when such societies are operating under the lodge system. By virtue of this proviso no taxes are assessed against such organizations as the Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Columbus, and so forth. While these organizations are exempt from taxation, no specific provision is found in the law exempting college fraternities from taxation under this section.

The Treasury Department, through the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, has ruled that a society or fraternity is "operating under the lodge system" when it is "carrying on its activities under a form of organization that comprises local branches chartered by a parent organization and largely self-governing, called lodges, chapters, or the like." In accordance with this ruling of the department, it is held that national fraternities with chapters in the different colleges having a parent organization from which these various chapters derive their charters are exempt from the taxes imposed under section 801. On the other hand, the Treasury Department has ruled that any fraternity existing only in a local college as an independent organization not deriving its charter from a parent organization does not fall within the exemption because such local society does not operate "under the lodge system" within the regulations above referred to.

The injustice of the existing situation is at once apparent. In nearly all American colleges the so-called national and local fraternities exist side by side, having the same quality of membership, organized for exactly the same purposes, and carrying on their work by the same methods. In short, they are similar in every respect, with the single exception that for some reason or other, because of age, prestige, or local conditions, the local chapters have never seen fit to become affiliated with national organizations. Under such circumstances it is obvious that to tax the locals and exempt the nationals is both unjust and inequitable. Moreover, it is well known that members of fraternal organizations, such as the Masons, are usually in a position to work and earn money with which to pay their dues and the taxes thereon. This is not true of members of college fraternities, who, if they are able to work at all, usually find it necessary to use all the money they can earn in order to pay their way through college.

In order to remedy the obvious injustice existing under the present law I offered an amendment to section 501 of the revenue act of 1924 exempting college fraternities from the payment of taxes assessed under this section. With this amendment added, the first sentence of the proviso will read as follows:

Provided, That there shall be exempted from the provisions of this section all amounts paid as dues or fees to a fraternal society, order, or association operating under the lodge system or to any local fraternal organization among the students of a college or university.

The House having adopted the amendment, if agreed to by the Senate it will do away with the present unjust discrimination against certain college fraternities and place them all in the same class with other fraternal organizations already exempt from taxation under the law.

I now desire to discuss the general income-tax provisions of the 1924 revenue act. Both on the floor of this House and in the public press there has been much comment relative to the comparative merits of the so-called Mellon and Garner plans for a general reduction of taxes. I desire at this time to discuss the situation briefly and to point out my reasons for supporting the Garner plan. Since the first session of Congress became organized I have given much time and thought to the proposed legislation for a reduction of taxes. I have made a careful study of the Mellon plan printed in a pamphlet containing 344 pages. I have also considered thoroughly the plan voiced by the minority of the Ways and Means Committee, known as the Garner plan, in order to determine which method would best promote a fair and equitable revision of taxes, at the same time accomplishing those substantial reductions in rates all along the line to which the country is justly entitled.

In his first message to Congress President Coolidge correctly and truly said:

The taxes of the Nation must be reduced now as much as prudence will permit, and expenditures must be reduced accordingly. They bear most heavily upon the poor. They diminish industry and commerce. They make agriculture unprofitable. They increase the rates on transportation. They are a charge on every necessary of life.

With these most significant words of the President in mind, let us examine the proposed Mellon plan and compare it with the so-called Garner plan to determine which method should be adopted by Congress in an effort to reduce taxation on a reasonable, just, and equitable basis.

Mr. GARNER's plan proposes to fix normal income-tax exemptions at $2,000 for single persons, instead of $1,000, as proposed by Mr. Mellon, and $3,000 for married persons or heads of families, instead of the present $2,500, as Mr. Mellon proposes. The Garner plan would also fix the normal income tax at 2 per cent on amounts of $5,000 and less, instead of 3 per cent on amounts less than $4,000, as proposed by Mr. Mellon, and instead of 4 per cent under the present law. Mr. GARNER would further fix the rate at 4 per cent from $5,000 to $8,000, instead of 6 per cent, proposed by Mr. Mellon, on incomes above $4,000 and instead of the 8 per cent under the present law.

The Garner plan will also fix the rate at 6 per cent on all incomes exceeding $8,000, instead of 8 per cent as under the present law. It will cause the surtax to commence with 1 per cent on incomes from $12,000 to $14,000, instead of $10,000 to $12,000 as Mr. Mellon proposes, and instead of $6,000 to $8,000, as under the present law. These surtax rates will then gradually increase to 44 per cent on incomes exceeding $92,000, instead of the 50 per cent under the present law and the 25 per cent on incomes exceeding $100,000 proposed by Mr. Mellon.

From an analysis of the two proposed plans we are at once confronted with the amazing and significant fact that the Garner plan, to a much greater extent than the Mellon plan, affords immediate relief by a reduction in taxes to 6,641,262 income-tax payers throughout the country, while the Mellon plan would confer a greater reduction than Mr. GARNER's on only 9,433 income-tax payers. For instance, Mr. Mellon would exempt only $1,000 from the income of a single man, while Mr. GARNER's plan doubles the amount of this exemption, making it $2,000. On the other hand, Mr. Mellon, universally reputed to have one of the largest personal incomes in America, proposes to reduce the taxes of the man with a million-dollar income more than a quarter of a million dollars per year.

In the light of a fair comparison and with the President's own words in mind, which plan should we adopt as better designed to promote a fair and equitable basis for a reduction of taxes? "They bear most heavily upon the poor."

An even more striking illustration of the actual working out of the two plans is shown by a concrete application of each to the situation existing in my own State of New Hampshire. According to the latest available statistics of the Treasury Department, 32,410 persons in New Hampshire paid Federal taxes for the year 1921. Of this number, 32,386 will receive a greater reduction in their taxes under the Garner plan than under the Mellon plan, while only 24 taxpayers in my whole State would receive a larger reduction in taxes under the Mellon plan than under the Garner plan. Assuming that these taxpayers are equally distributed in each congressional district, it follows that in the first congressional district only 12 taxpayers would receive greater reductions under the Mellon plan than under the Garner plan, while 16,193 taxpayers of the first district would have their taxes more substantially reduced under the Garner plan.

I am indeed most heartily in favor of a reduction in taxes, such a reduction as will stimulate business and industry. At the same time, it is necessary to bear in mind that relief from the burden of taxes must be just and equitable; that taxes should always be borne by those best able to carry the burden; that "they are a charge on every necessary of life" and that always "they bear most heavily upon the poor."

A vast amount of propaganda has been disseminated throughout the Nation to induce Congress to adopt the Mellon plan without regard to its effect upon the great majority who pay Federal income taxes. When traced to its original source we find that most of such propaganda has come from those who hope to receive immediate benefit from the Mellon plan through the reduction of their surtaxes, rather than those who are honestly interested in an attempt to secure an equitable distribution of taxes among citizens of all classes.

It is our duty as Members of this great legislative body to disregard organized propaganda and to seek the truth in the light of the facts. And it is my sincere belief that a thorough study of all the facts will convince any reasonable man that the adoption of the Garner plan will afford more just and equitable taxes throughout the Nation. It will lower the taxes of the rich and poor alike. It will provide the necessary revenue to run the Government, and it will ultimately place the taxes of the Nation upon the shoulders of those best able to bear the burden.

I have listened with interest to the advocates of the Mellon plan. Their arguments, instead of sustaining their contentions, furnish further evidence that such a plan will afford great relief to a certain special class of taxpayers, namely, those whose incomes are so large that they pay high surtaxes, while scarcely any relief is given the taxpayer in moderate circumstances with a small income.

In conclusion let me say that, regardless of what others may do, I am convinced that it is my duty to support the Garner plan, which, as I have said, will relieve the poor as well as the rich and which, let me repeat, in my own State of New Hampshire will give a greater degree of relief to 32,386 out of 32,410 taxpayers than would the Mellon plan.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, although much has already been said on both sides of this important question, I feel that it behooves me also to voice my sentiments against any plan that ignores the fundamental basis of just taxation, namely, that the share of one's tax burden should be levied according to his ability to pay. In other words, taxes should bear heaviest upon those best able to pay.

This is a well-recognized and sound principle of taxation. Any plan that fails to take cognizance of this must and should meet defeat.

Very closely allied with this principle is the idea that a plan in order to be feasible must give us reasonable assurance that it will accomplish that which it is designed to do. I suppose that in proposing any kind of legislation there must be some urgent need for it, some present wrong to be remedied, or threatening evil to be averted.

That there is a great need for tax legislation I believe is the unanimous opinion of this body. But what is it that we are trying to remedy by this legislation? How will the Mellon plan, which I believe entirely ignores the principle that the share of one's tax burden should be levied according to his ability to pay, a principle that is the very essence of just taxation, remedy these evils? These are questions that we must constantly ask ourselves in considering the plan before us.

President Coolidge, in his address before Congress on December 6, in reviewing the economic situation of this country, had this to say:

> Looked at as a whole, the Nation is in the enjoyment of remarkable prosperity. Industry and commerce are thriving. For the most part agriculture is successful, 11 staples having risen in value from about $5,300,000,000 two years ago to about $7,000,000,000 for the current year.
> But range cattle are still low in price, and some sections of the wheat area, notably Minnesota, North Dakota, and on west, have many cases of actual distress. With his products not selling on a parity with the products of industry, every sound remedy that can be devised should be applied for the relief of the farmer.

The President has thus in his message frankly admitted this fact to exist at the present time, namely, a situation where, while industry and commerce are thriving, the farmers in the West are in distress. Yes; the President might well have included the average wage worker who, too, because of the still existing high cost of living and moderate wages finds himself in a no more prosperous situation than the farmer.

A very wholesome situation, is it not? A society where the masses are growing poorer, burdened with high cost of living and a staggering war debt thrust upon them while a privileged few, owning and controlling the industry and commerce, which in the words of our President are now thriving, are growing richer day by day. This appalling situation, partly admitted and, if you please, mostly omitted, by the President in his message; yet what does he and his devoted friends in Congress propose to do? Their answer is, "Pass the Mellon tax bill."

Gentlemen, in seeking to bring about a change in our tax laws it is fair, then, to assume that the sole purpose is to alleviate the burdens of those who are now hardest hit. I can see no other honest motive that would warrant the consideration of the tax question at this time. Will the Mellon tax bill meet this situation? Will it be of any appreciable aid to the farmers, wage workers, and general public?

I do not pretend to be an expert in taxation, nor will I burden you with any detailed analysis of this plan. My friend and colleague [Mr. FREAR] has already given you a careful explanation of the results of the Mellon plan. It is not very difficult, gentlemen, to see how this plan will only benefit those with large incomes at the expense of the many others.

The workings of this plan are very graphically and ably shown in an editorial by Mr. Werner N. Schomaker, editor of The Union Labor, published at Marinette, Wis., a very worthy and progressive organ that speaks for the people in my district. I am going to read this article in order that you may hear directly from my people:

> It will be noted that the Literary Digest, in line with the big-interests press of the country, omits any reference to the big criticism of the Mellon measure—that it is a bill framed purely in the interest of the rich man. The press, almost as a unit, has conspired to keep from the people the great benefits that would accrue to the country's millionaires, including Mr. Mellon, in the passage of the bill.

Have the newspapers told the country that a man with an income of $5,000,000 will save $1,500,000 under the Mellon bill; that a man with an income of $500,000 will save $116,000? Here is a table showing the amounts which persons of varying incomes will save under the Mellon bill:

Income of $5,000,000, a saving of $1,500,000.

Incomes of $1,000,000	$251,784.00
Income of $500,000	116,784.00
Income of $250,000	49,284.00
Income of $100,000	10,284.00
Income of $50,000	1,944.00
Income of $25,000	1,107.00
Income of $20,000	747.00
Income of $15,000	469.50
Income of $10,000	222.00
Income of $5,000	29.75
Income of $4,000	12.75

These are the amounts they would save under the Mellon plan. Now let us analyze this further and see how the Mellon bill works to the advantage of the persons with the huge incomes:

A person with $1,000,000 income saves under the Mellon plan $251,784.

Fifty heads of families, each having an income of $20,000, total $1,000,000, save under the Mellon plan $35,350.

One hundred heads of families, each having an income of $10,000, total $1,000,000, save under the Mellon plan $22,200.

Two hundred heads of families, each having an income of $5,000, total $1,000,000, save under the Mellon plan $5,950.

Four hundred heads of families, each having an income of $2,500, total $1,000,000, save under the Mellon plan nothing.

The propagandists of the Mellon tax plan continually refer to percentage of reduction taxpayers will receive. It is not a question of percentages, but a question of dollars and cents.

Evidently the Mellon plan needs as much bolstering as the League of Nations did under the Bok referendum.

This is practically the unanimous sentiment of the people whom I have the honor to represent, and that is the way they have the Mellon tax plan sized up.

Yet the advocates of this plan would hold this out as a panacea for the present ills. Their eyes are shut to the real situation or they refuse to see. They turn a deaf ear to the cries for help of the distressed agricultural classes of our country. They only speechify about helping the farmers. It is now three months that Congress has been in session, but nothing has been done and the farmers go on suffering. The Nation is tired of talks and more talks, speeches, and radio messages. The White House would do well to abandon this kind of tactics and get down to brass tacks and do something.

Here the Norris-Sinclair farm relief bill has been before Congress for three months, and little or nothing done about it. They are the best farm relief measures that have been introduced in Congress thus far. They have received the warm support of the oppressed farming class of the Nation. But any good measure that is a real relief of the situation must not pass. If you can not defeat it entirely, get it out of the way by a substitute. That is what will happen to real farm legislation. Substitutes are quite common nowadays. In fact, they are becoming so numerous that we occasionally discover their real identity. We thought we had a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. We know better now. Every man, woman, and child knows that it is only a substitute. It is a government of the two old reactionary political parties, by Falls and for Sinclairs and Doheneys.

You have heard the President's warning in his message to Congress of December 6. There must not be a wholesale assault upon the Public Treasury. Yet that is what he and Mr. Mellon and those of you advocating this bill propose to do. Of course that may be all right when we do not speak about helping the farmers or adjusted compensation for the ex-service men. I realize we can sing the song a different tune to suit the occasion.

The Mellon plan will take from the coffers of our Treasury millions of dollars and hand it over to the big fellow. This is no empty statement. In one instance alone, this bill lops off $11,000,000 from the taxes that 21 gentlemen with incomes of $1,000,000 or more who, under the present rates, would have to pay $19,000,000 into the Public Treasury. A handsome little gift of $11,000,000 neatly wrapped up in the Mellon bill to a privileged few. And do you think for a moment that the people of the United States will stand for that? Why should these gentlemen be relieved of paying $11,000,000 which you propose by cutting the surtax rates on large incomes from 50 per cent which they now pay to 25 per cent.

You are much more concerned about the decrease in the million-dollar-a-year income class than to relieve the common masses who are now greatly in need. You cite with alarm, the figures about the million-dollar-a-year or better class, which reveal the fact that in 1916 there were 206 who were making a little million or more a year, in 1917 only 141 had this privilege, by 1918 the number had fallen to 67, in 1919 there were 69, in 1920 there were 33, and now only 21 are receiving an income over $1,000,000. Under the present tax the million-dollar-a-year fellow has to pay 55 per cent of his income or $550,000. What a pity. He has only $450,000 left on which to live.

These are the figures of those who have reported their large earnings, but they do not tell us about the many who are escaping their taxes by the use of tax-dodging devices, who, if they would honestly report their incomes, would swell the ranks of the million-dollar-a-year class. Even so, I say, there are 21 too many of these enjoying a million-dollar-a-year income. But, gentlemen, the $11,000,000 is not the only loot from the Public Treasury that will be the result of the passage of the Mellon plan. Why, it is pregnant with bad features that will result only in the enrichment of those with large incomes.

One other condemning feature in the plan is the 25 per cent flat rebate on taxes for the fiscal year of 1923. This will mean a loss to the Treasury of about $232,750,000, as is given out by the committee's report. I wonder how much of that will be the workingman's or farmer's share, who do not earn enough even to pay an income tax. Do you realize that while 4,300,000 persons are paying income taxes, 19,000,000 families in this country live on less than $2,000 a year? Of the 4,300,000 persons that are paying some income tax, 83 per cent receive incomes of less than $5,000 a year. Draw your own conclusions, if you will, who here again gets away with the biggest slice of this rebate.

It is interesting to note that it is these same interests who are now being so well taken care of by the Mellon plan that just two years ago raised the cry for lower taxes and were able to shove through the last Congress a bill which repealed the excess profits tax and reduced the surtax from 65 per cent to 50 per cent, or $500,000,000 annually, but practically nothing was done for the little fellow.

But it was then claimed, as it is now, that reduction on surtaxes will mean greater prosperity, lower cost of living, and more work. Do not forget the last, "more work"; but they did not say anything about better wages. How much has the cost of living been reduced in the last two years? I ask you. How much has the plight of the farmer and worker been bettered as a result of exempting the big fellow from paying his just share of the taxes by repealing the excess-profits tax and reducing the surtaxes? Not only has there been no change for the better but the condition of the masses is growing worse. The cost of living is increasing, rents are sky high, many essentials in life according to American standards are almost beyond the reach of the average man. The farmer can not sell his crops; he has to give them away for almost nothing; the trusts and speculators have him by the throat and are gradually squeezing his belongings from him. The once healthy landowning, prosperous farming people of America are swiftly becoming landless and poverty-stricken tenants.

Gentlemen, I am for lower taxes. I am in favor of the abolition of the excise taxes that have unjustly been weighing down the jewelry-merchant business and the automobile business and many other lines of industry. These sales taxes inevitably were reflected in the articles purchased by the consuming public. I am in favor of abolition of the so-called nuisance taxes. I am opposed to the continuation of amusement taxes, such as taxes on theater tickets, and so forth. I would abolish all these so-called nuisance and sales taxes.

I am in favor of the tax plan such as was outlined by my colleague and friend Mr. FREAR, who has so ably and forcefully set forth the wishes of the Progressives in this matter of taxation.

The real problem, then, is not so much tax reduction as it is tax readjustment. We must get away from the warped standards of taxation, such as has been the basis of the Mellon plan, and get back to the principle that taxes should be levied according to ability to pay; and the sooner we do this the sooner will we actually bring relief to the country.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Speaker, the question of taxation has more of interest to me, and should have to every Representative, than any that may come before us for consideration. Upon it depends the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the individual and the Nation. It has rightly been characterized as the power to destroy by many students of taxation as well as by our own Supreme Court in decisions bearing upon the subject. That its importance demands great research, profound study, and experience will not be denied. It would seem ludicrous, therefore, for one so ill informed as I to take issue with those who for two decades and more have devoted so much time and thought to the subject, and I would not do so were it not apparent to even a casual observer that political advantage has a first place in the consideration of the revenue measure before us.

The demand for reduction in taxes has been so general and so pronounced that it approaches an upheaval in its proportions. I can not think that a request or effort by a few financiers could have aroused such a general demand for a reduction of taxes. I am constrained to believe that it is a spontaneous expression of suffering with which the business and agricultural interests of the country are afflicted. The Mellon plan was the first suggestion of relief in the matter of taxation, and became immediately popular. It is, of course, impossible that the public could know the details, advantages, or disadvantages of any of the plans that have been proposed. It wants tax reduction, and the Mellon idea was the first and only clear-cut proposal that has been presented. Other proposals seem to have only to do with a surtax, normal tax, and nuisance taxes, and have been advanced as amendments to the Mellon idea.

The foundation and framework of a tax plan is embodied only in House Resolution 6715. It was suggested when the Mellon plan was first announced that it proposed a simplification of the income-tax returns, a demand which has been and is universal. Indeed, the complaints against the intricacies, uncertainties, and utter inability to understand these laws by the average citizen has been the principal complaint against the income tax, but of all the measures that have been proposed the one now under consideration seems to me to be the most vicious, most dangerous, and most unjust.

I have always felt that incomes are a source from which the Government should derive revenue provided it is equitably apportioned. I have never felt, however, that a progressive income tax is either just or in conformity with the spirit of our Constitutttion. Indeed, I have not thought until consideration of the so-called Mellon plan began that it was constitutional. Only now do I concede so much because I find the Supreme Court, whose duty it is to interpret the law, has declared it permissible by the Constitution. That Congress has the right to tax incomes has not at any time been denied. Contentions have arisen from the belief that the tax has been improperly applied. The first income-tax law enacted by the Congress was in 1861 and continued until 1870, when it was repealed. There was no contest under these laws. In 1894 Congress again enacted an income-tax law which provided a flat tax of 2 per cent on incomes in excess of $4,000.

The constitutionality of this law was attacked in the case of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (U. S. 157, p. 429) on the ground primarily that it taxed incomes from lands, which is a direct tax, and, therefore, subject to apportionment.

Paragraph 3, section 2, Article I, of the Constitution provides that—

> Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within the Union according to their respective numbers.

This apportionment not having been made, it was claimed that such a tax was confiscatory. The Supreme Court did not declare that income taxes as such were unconstitutional, but did determine what constitutes a direct tax, namely, capitation, lands and houses, and the revenue derived from these sources.

Section 8, Article I, provides that the—

> Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts, etc., of the United States, but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Previously it had been assumed that all income taxes would come under the head of excises, treating only as direct taxes a head tax and tax upon land values. This decision, above mentioned, therefore defined the two separate sources from which income could be derived—direct and indirect. The constitutionality of the indirect tax not having been attacked, the court did not at that time undertake to express an opinion as to taxes under this head, but merely declared the act as unconstitutional because there had been a failure to apportion the direct tax. There was a rehearing of this case (U. S. 158, p. 41), and on May 20, 1895, the court affirmed its previous decision, declaring that income from personal property is also a direct tax, still failing to express an opinion upon excise or indirect taxes other than that they should be uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. Justice Field, while concurring with the majority opinion in the aforesaid case, went further, taking the position that the act of 1894, as related to incomes, was unconstitutional in that it exempted from taxation incomes of $4,000 or less, thus destroying the uniformity of the tax, and closed his opinion with these remarks:

> I could not say less in view of questions of such gravity that go down to the very foundation of the Government. If the provisions of the Constitution can be set aside by an act of Congress, where is the course of usurpation to end? The present assault upon capital is but the beginning. It will be but the stepping stone to others, larger and more sweeping, till our political contests will become a war of the poor against the rich; a war constantly growing in intensity and bitterness.

No more prophetic vision was ever expressed; within 20 years his predictions reached the culmination of all of his fears. For 10 years the war has raged with a growing intensity, and the end is not yet. To-day the avowed purpose of many upon this floor is to exempt the poor, and relatively poor, from any income tax and to take from the larger incomes so much as to prevent that which they are pleased to term "swollen fortunes."

The difficulty of enacting legislation taxing incomes from indirect sources and at the same time from direct sources necessitated an amendment to the Federal Constitution, which was submitted by the Sixty-first Congress, in 1910. The resolution was submitted, not with the idea of giving Congress greater power to tax incomes than it already possessed, but to define how the tax might be laid, and reads as follows: "That Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration." This was ratified by 36 States and proclaimed by the Secretary of State February 25, 1913. The evident intent of the amendment was to reach incomes from direct sources. It did not create any new source from which incomes might be collected, but merely brought together the two sources, direct and indirect, in such shape that Congress could, without complication, enact an income tax law. Congress, in June, 1913, enacted an income tax law and made it progressive. This was contested, and in 1916 declared constitutional by a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is my opinion that the Supreme Court was too liberal in its interpretation as to the tax from excises, which the Constitution requires to be uniform.

The graduated tax is a varying tax, and is not uniform in that it undertakes to tax incomes of one person at a higher rate than that of another. A flat tax upon all incomes is indisputably the equitable method by which incomes should be taxed, and so it was considered by both the States and Congress until the progressive idea was advanced in 1913.

By a flat tax I mean the same percentage of an income, be it large or small, viz, if A has an income of $10,000,000 and B an income of $10,000, and a tax of 10 per cent were laid, A would pay a tax of $1,000,000, while B would pay $1,000; each would pay in proportion to his means, but if a progressive tax is laid, ranging, as proposed in the bill under consideration, the income up to ten or twelve thousand, as the case may be, would pay no surtax. The incomes from $10,000 to $100,000 would vary from 1 to 25 or 44 per cent, and those above $100,000 would pay at the same per cent as those of $100,000. This applies in principle equally to the Mellon and Garner plans.

The inconsistency being that neither plan carries out the theory of placing the burden of taxation upon those best able to bear it. As a matter of fact, the burden of progressive taxation is applied as between the incomes of $10,000 and $100,000, and there the progressive feature ends, leaving all incomes from $100,000 up to infinity to be taxed at the same rate as the $100,000 income and exempting those of $10,000 and under, so that the progressive tax is placed on those incomes which by no possible stretch of the imagination could be considered as a menace to the welfare or well-being of the American people, and certainly can not be regarded as uniform. The Supreme Court, however, has concluded that the word "uniform" means "geographical." The exact intent of this interpretation is not clear to me, the inference, however, appearing to be that "uniform" means varying, in the discretion of Congress. If this be true, and in practice it seems to be, that Congress could enlarge upon the idea and take all of the net income from Mr. Ford, Mr. Wrigley, Mr. Mellon, the Standard Oil Co., and so forth, and thus destroy the so-called menace to society. Constitutional guaranties would be eliminated and the avenue opened wide for confiscation at the instance of communistic movements, which have for their purpose the destruction of property rights. Be it remembered that this bill would not only exempt incomes up to and including $10,000 and end its progressive feature at $100,000, but it also proposes to exempt earned incomes to the extent of 25 per cent over those of incomes from other sources of like amount, still further infringing upon the meaning of the word "uniform" as given by our standard dictionaries. While not in sympathy with any of the plans proposed, I am confronted with the fact that the plan is already in force and the degree at which this confiscatory process shall proceed is the question only with which we have to deal. My own opinion is that the so-called Mellon plan approximates more nearly equity than does either the Garner plan or the Frear plan, the difference, however, being so slight that it is my purpose to vote with my party and not take advantage of my liberty to vote for that which I consider the better. Permit me to submit a table of rates and taxes derived therefrom:

The precedents established under this system of taxation may, with the changing vicissitudes of political conditions, some day react upon those whom we now seek to exempt in favor of those upon whom we now place the burden; such has been the history of autocracies. In our envy and malice and venom toward the man who has made "two blades of grass grow" instead of one we march with hilarity to the slogan, "We'll place the burden of taxation upon those best able to bear it." To accomplish this end we override with impatience certain constitutional inhibitions which are far more valuable to the poor man than to the rich, and though they now enable us to attain the end desired are susceptible to the grossest kind of oppression for our posterity when wealth shall in turn assume the reins of Government.

The colonist when subject to the British were oppressed by burdensome and unusual taxes. They were not given representation, and therefore had no voice in the burden placed upon them. To collect these oppressive taxes, because of which the people began to complain, British detectives and spies were authorized to break into the privacy of the home, to search and seize private papers, records, and correspondence of the people, thus destroying their peace, happiness, and prosperity by placing their liberty in the hands of irresponsible petty officers.

John Adams, in the year 1817, referring to the trial of a case at Boston in the year 1761, at which he was present, for the searching of premises under general search warrants for smuggled liquor, in which the British court held that though an invasion of the citizens' rights it was necessary to enforce the law, declared that "American independence was then and there born" "In 15 years, 1776, he grew up to manhood and declared himself free." The colonist knew full well the price of liberty. They were willing to pay. Having suffered the humiliations imposed by a British tyrant plus seven years of war, can any sane mind conceive for a moment that those patriots, breathing the air of freedom, when assembled to construct a Government, did not mean every word literally that they wrote into a solemn contract between themselves and their posterity as parties of the first part and the creation by their own hands of a party of the second part?

This contract which we call a Constitution was intended as the inner fort of defense against a duplication of British tyranny. The Congress elected each two years was to be a first line of defense, the Senate a second, and finally the Constitution manned by the Supreme Court was to be the third line. In less than 130 years attacks by minorities of selfishness and greed have broken through the first line in sundry places, undermined the second, and has unquestionably made breaches in the third. To-day we find the first and second lines joining in an effort to destroy the liberty so dearly purchased. It would seem that the courts have weakened. The "big Bertha"—Congress—has been trained upon liberty. Breach after breach has been made. The Constitution said direct taxes shall be apportioned among the States according to representation determined by a census, meaning unquestionably to be kept as nearly equal and uniform as possible. The Supreme Court said this tax was not intended to be equal. The Constitution says that duties, impost, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. The court said incomes from realty and personal property is not an excise but a direct tax and subject to apportionment. The Constitution was changed to remove the direct income from apportionment. The court then said uniform taxes as applied to incomes do not mean equal taxes but is "geographical," and hence income taxes mean unequal taxes if Congress so wills. The Constitution says that property shall not be taken without due process. The court says that as applied to incomes unequal tax by progression does not take property without due process, and therefore not confiscatory. The Constitution says that Congress shall make the law and does not authorize it to delegate that power. The court says that Congress has the right to delegate these powers if they call them rules and regulations. The executive branch then makes a code of laws for violation of which citizens may be imprisoned. The Constitution says that the right to be free from unreasonable search and seizures shall not be violated. Congress says that the income tax and prohibition laws can not be enforced without an invasion of those rights. Now, what is the effect of this violence to the Constitution by the Congress and these decisions by the court? Some citizens have had and are having 50 per cent of their property (income) taken from them, while others are exempted; but this is "geographical," and therefore the fathers who fought the war in order to enjoy equal rights intended arbitrary and unequal taxation for their posterity. Congress says that a progressive tax is a just tax.

The court says all right. The Executive branch of the Government makes law and the citizen is persecuted. The Executive searches the home, the premises, the papers, books and letters of respectable citizens, and seizes his property without warrant. The fathers said government exist by consent of the governed. Congress and the Executive says we will govern without consent. The fathers said that government should afford the greatest amount of peace, happiness, and prosperity. Congress and the Executive backed to some extent by the Supreme Court says that we are the judges of what should be peace, happiness, and prosperity. English jurisprudence since the days of Magna Charter assumes that "all persons are innocent of crime till proven guilty, and the burden of proof rests upon the Government." Congress and the Executive, aided by court decisions, assumes that all persons are guilty of crime and the burden of proof as to innocence rest upon the citizen. Are we not back where we were in 1775? How long ere we must again fight the same old fight of our fathers against the tyrants John and Charles and George. What is there to a name? What matters if it be a king, an emperor, a president, a bureau, or a Congress, if we are to be taxed for the pleasure of the farmer to-day, the laborer to-morrow, capital the day after, and so forth, if the sacred rights of home, person, and private effects are to be violated at the instance of irresponsible underlings—if property rights are to be confiscated? Once upon the road to autocracy no Government ever turns back, and rarely, if ever, even halts. To invoke Constitutional limitation is but to provoke derision, so uncompromisingly determined are we to destroy those whom because of their wealth we are pleased to regard as a menace to society. Be it remembered that the estimated tangible wealth of the Nation is $300,000,000,000, it is safe to assume an intangible wealth of $200,000,000,000 in addition, or a total of $500,000,000,000 compared to this the menace of our wealthiest citizen with $750,000,000, would not seem particularly to be feared. My opinion is that the law against promogeniture will take care of this danger. So thought the framers of our Government. The breaking down of constitutional guaranties is a menace to the poor and the rich alike.

Section 1001 delegates absolutely to the commissioner authority to prescribe all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this act. It would have been more accurate to have stated that the commissioner is hereby authorized to make and repeal such law as he may deem necessary for the enforcement of this act. The power to make law is vested solely and exclusively in Congress, and the authority to delegate that power has not yet been given. There is nothing more important, however, to every citizen in the United States than the question of his taxes, and if there is any line to be drawn anywhere, at any time, under any conditions, as to the power of Congress to delegate to the executive branch of the Government the right to make law, this is the place and time at which and in which the line should be drawn. These rules and regulations have the binding force of law and subject the citizen to the penalties provided by the bill. Every citizen has a right to know what the law is, but under the powers herein delegated these laws of the commissioner may be changed from day to day, with no opportunity to the citizen to know of the changes that may have been made. The citizen is placed absolutely at the mercy of the honesty, of the decency, and of the intelligence of the commissioner and his assistants. The framers of our Government never intended that such powers should be exercised by the Executive. On the contrary, they attempted in every way possible to separate this power from the Executive, realizing the danger to human liberty resulting therefrom.

Section 1002–A provides that every person shall keep such records as may be required by the commissioner and Secretary. In other words, the millions of people who are struggling with small capital to earn a competence in some line of business would be forced to keep an extended system of red-tape bookkeeping at the command of the commissioner, a burden the cost of which can not be estimated. We have no means of knowing or determining what has been the cost to American citizens of making income-tax returns, and meeting the many unreasonable and complicated demands made by the commissioner. I have an idea that this cost runs into the hundreds of millions of dollars for the employment of lawyers, certified accountants, and traveling expenses to Washington in an effort to protect themselves against demands which they believe to be unjust and unreasonable.

Section 1004 provides that any revenue agent or inspector designated by the commissioner may examine the books, papers, records, or memorandum bearing upon matters required in a return. This enables a detective of the Government to pry into the most private and sacred matters of any citizen, in direct violation of the fourth amendment to the Constitution. I do no believe there is a Member of this body who can or would deny the accuracy of this statement. It is a most vicious principle, that takes from the American citizen the most sacred right and privilege guaranteed by the Constitution and enjoyed prior to the ratification of the sixteenth amendment. Surely there is intelligence enough in this body and among the splendid men who compose the Ways and Means Committee to draft a tax measure that would be within the limits of the Constitution and protect American citizens in the rights to which they are entitled. The practice of committees in accepting bills written by the executive departments of our Government is dangerous in the extreme and unworthy of the intelligence of this Congress.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I have offered an amendment to subsection 1 of section 701 of the pending revenue bill. As reported by the Ways and Means Committee, this bill imposes a tax on brokers whose business is to negotiate sales of stocks, bonds, and other securities. It is intended primarily to reach the membership of organizations like the stock exchanges at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and other large cities. It imposes a flat tax of $50 on each broker and requires the payment of an additional amount based on the value of the broker's seat or membership in the stock exchange. If the seat or membership is worth from $2,000 to $5,000, the broker pays an additional tax of $100. If the membership is worth more than $5,000, the additional tax is $150.

Now, my amendment proposes to increase this tax in proportion to the value of the seat or membership. The section as reported by the committee makes the tax on a seat or membership worth $5,000 the same as the tax on a seat or membership worth $50,000 or $100,000. A membership on the New York Stock Exchange sells at prices ranging from $75,000 to $100,000. Under a progressive tax system, why should not this tax on these seats be graduated according to the value of such membership?

Assuming that a seat or membership on the New York Stock Exchange is worth $75,000 and a seat or membership in the Minneapolis Stock Exchange is worth $5,000, is there any reason or equity in charging the Minneapolis broker the same tax as is charged against the New York broker?

The section as reported by the committee starts out all right and is good as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough. A seat or membership in the New York Stock Exchange is exceedingly valuable, because on the floor of this exchange are sold daily stocks and bonds of the value of many millions of dollars. This means a large volume of business for the members and a greater opportunity for profits. Is it reasonable to tax a broker who handles only a few transactions on a second or third class stock exchange the same as the broker who does an exceedingly large business on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange?

My amendment not only graduates and equalizes the brokerage tax, but it will multiply the revenue from this source many times. The section as it now stands is only a gesture in the right direction. My amendment will make this provision a real revenue producer.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am in favor of the highest kind of inheritance tax, yet I am opposed to the Ramseyer amendment increasing inheritance taxes beyond the present rate. As to the theory of inheritance taxes, a purpose thereof, but not the primary purpose, is to raise revenue. We must always, however, keep in sight of the fact that fundamentally it is to prevent concentration of large wealth in the hands of a few individuals that we have these death duties. The inheritance tax, on the other hand, is the most direct tax we have. It is a tax that can be least evaded. It is a tax that will get at tax-exempt securities; and while I voted for the tax-exempt securities constitutional amendment, I will say to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], yet I am opposed to this amendment.

And why? We are living under a dual form of government, where the State government is sovereign and the Federal Government is sovereign under the Constitution, and we have the condition where the Federal Government is in the business of inheritance tax and where the State governments are in the business of inheritance tax, and we know which is the stronger of the two. The Federal Government is irrepressible, and once the Federal Government gets in competition with the State governments we know that the States must, of necessity, recede.

Now, I have taken the trouble to make a computation of the maximum rates that have been fixed by the various Commonwealths, and the amounts are astounding. We find, for example, that the maximum rate at which West Virginia taxes collateral relatives and what the Germans call "laughing heirs" is as high as 35 per cent; that Wisconsin and Washington are as high as 40 per cent; that Missouri and Illinois are 30 per cent; that Oregon, Nevada, and Arizona are 25 per cent; that Georgia taxes 21 per cent; that Iowa, Indiana, and California are 20 per cent.

Now, my friends, where and when will this intense competition cease? If we increase these inheritance taxes beyond 25 per cent, we know that the State governments will ape the Federal Government and they will increase the rates correspondingly.

In regard to New York State we have a condition where New York will be deprived, if you pass this amendment, of a goodly portion of its source of revenue. We are taxed in New York, for example, to the extent of nearly 3 per cent on city real property on its assessed valuation. That is a tremendously high rate, and that is because the State government can not otherwise secure enough revenue and therefore levies a direct tax upon the various cities and communities, who in turn tax real estate at very high rates.

Now, New York and other States are about to pass a State soldiers' bonus. We know, for example, that there are $11,000,000,000 of tax-exempt securities in existence. Where are the States going to get the money to pay the principal on all these tax-exempt securities nd the State soldiers' bonus? They must get it somewhere. I can say with greater grace than some gentlemen on that side of the House that I am in favor of the State-rights theory of government, and I do not want to see the Federal Government reaching out like an octopus in every direction, seeking and seizing every source of revenue that is now open to the States. For example, in New York City, because we have prohibition, we have been deprived of certain excise taxes, with the result that almost our entire police pension fund has been depleted, and that fund faces a gigantic deficit.

Where is New York going to raise the money to effect a surplus rather than have a deficit in the police fund? That is only typical of the situation in New York City and elsewhere throughout the country. We must not, without the maturest kind of consideration, take away this source of revenue from the States.

Away back in 1907, before New York passed its transfer tax law, in a report of the special tax commission presided over by Mr. Edward R. N. Seligman, of Columbia University, this report was made to the New York Legislature:

> From the point of view of financial needs, therefore, it is eminently desirable that the National Government should refrain from seizing on those sources of revenue which can constitutionally be utilized by our various Commonwealths and which will surely be more and more needed as time goes on.
> It is probably without a due appreciation of the importance of this fact that the President—

Roosevelt was President then—> has recommended and many public-spirited and wealthy citizens have indorsed national inheritance taxes. The States must therefore not only act promptly by fastening upon these and other substantial subjects of taxation by equitable methods, so as to hold within our borders much-needed revenue for local purposes, but they must so seek to develop them that these sources of revenue be not closed to us in the future by the irresistible competition of the National Government. The National Government is stronger than any State government. If such taxes are once placed upon the statute books of the Nation as permanent measures, they will not readily be removed.

How true that prophecy has come to be. The Federal Government is seeking more and more to invade the States and take away from the States their right to tax and take away from the States their various and many sources of revenue, so that there is really nothing left to the States except a small income-tax rate, and the large income taxes we are fastening upon the country discourage the States from even trying to get their adequate portion of revenue from income tax.

Now, I admit there is a lack of comity in the country with reference to inheritance taxes. I have a case in mind where a man had Rock Island bonds in a safe-deposit vault in Boston. He was domiciled in New York and his estate had to pay an inheritance tax on those bonds in four different States; and why?

New York got its inheritance tax from his estate because he was domiciled there. Massachusetts insisted upon getting its inheritance tax because the physical possession of the security was in Massachusetts, because the securities were in a safe-deposit box in Boston, and the States of Illinois and Iowa insisted on getting their proportion because, as I understand it, the Rock Island Railroad Co. was incorporated in both of those Commonwealths. In addition to that, the Federal Government also insisted upon exacting its toll of the Federal inheritance tax.

I know of another case where a man in Michigan made a large bequest to the Smithsonian Institution, a Federal agency, and the State of Michigan said, "We must have our tax because Michigan"—as I understood it—"only allows a limit with reference to exemptions where the gift is made to educational institutions." And we had the spectacle of the Smithsonian Institution being compelled to pay back into the coffers of Michigan a portion of that gift.

I had to handle an estate in my office where it was necessary to file inheritance-tax returns in over a dozen different States, and several of them taxed the same property. It takes days and sometimes weeks to get waivers from the comptrollers or treasurers of the various States, which waivers evidence payment, or lack of necessity for payment, of the death duties; with the result that the endless delay results sometimes in violent changes in values due to fluctuations in the stock market quotations. Such uncertainties ought never enter into the sale of securities by executors and trustees of estates.

If a corporation is organized in State A and does business in State B and the decedent holding its stock lived in State C, all three States will exact its toll from the stock. Ofttimes the taxes due the various Commonwealths total more than the value of the stock.

Every State has a different inheritance-tax procedure and law. Florida advertises that it proposes to amend its constitution to prevent the exaction of inheritance taxes, so as to attract rich men to come there and die.

Now, I say, because of this disparity of State inheritance taxes, because of this lack of comity, there should be assembled, as the gentleman from New York has well said, at some place representatives from all the Commonwealths and representatives of the Federal Government to work out some logical and scientific scheme of taxation on inheritances, and thus avoid the spectacle of a person being compelled to pay taxes to several States on the same property.

Until this chaos is removed from State transfer taxes the Federal Government should leave well enough alone.

We have a uniform sales act, a uniform negotiable instruments law, and should have a uniform transfer tax law operative in the various States.

IN OPPOSITION TO GIFT TAX AMENDMENT.

The so-called gift tax is objectionable because—

1. It is unnecessary.
2. It defeats the purpose of the inheritance taxes.

It is idle and regrettable to add subjects of taxation to the revenue bill when its purpose is to reduce taxes and to decrease the number of subjects and articles to be taxed. The revenue bill is, indeed, the piece de resistance of the present session of Congress, but the gift tax will not sit well upon the stomach of the Nation.

Of all nations France is the only one that I know of that has a gift tax. The principal theory of the inheritance tax is the prevention of concentrated wealth in the hands of a few. Democracies are jealous of swollen fortunes, that make for the very antithesis of democracy, namely, moneyed aristocracy. The inheritance tax, therefore, is supposed to encourage the rich man to divide his wealth in his lifetime, under penalty of paying the tax at his death. But if you penalize him in his lifetime by a gift tax—a tax on all gratuitous distribution of his property—you discourage the very diffusion of large estates, which diffusion the inheritance tax aims at, and on the other hand you increase the incentive to pile up fortunes, the very evil that the inheritance tax discourages.

The inheritance tax or death duties have not the primary purpose of raising revenue; that is its secondary purpose. Its primary purpose was and is to fritter away what Roosevelt called "swollen fortunes." The gift tax defeats this purpose.

The rich man, if you have the large inheritance tax and the corresponding gift tax, is caught between two fires; he is damned if he does and damned if he does not—that is, he is heavily taxed if he divides his property during his lifetime by gifts and is heavily taxed if he does not, and keeps it intact till death, when the inheritance taxes attach it. The gift tax will undoubtedly yield revenue and lots of it, but a great evil is engendered. The rich man, caught between Scylla of gift taxes and Charybdis of death taxes prefers always to hold his property to the end and pay the death taxes. We thus play into the hands of "swollen fortunes." Mortmain "the dead hand" is triumphant. The dead man controls the estate now in the hands of the living. His dead hand reaches out in absolute control.

This amendment is ill considered. I have examined the files of the Congressional Library and found nothing on it. England has no gift tax. No continental nation, except France, has adopted it. We know little of the operation of such a law. I am opposed to it and hope it shall be voted down despite the fact that its author is the ranking member on our side on the Ways and Means Committee, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], a man whose wisdom and prudence I shall always respect, but whose leadership I must respectfully decline to follow at this time.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5078, the Interior Department appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5078, the Interior Department appropriation bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I want to ask the gentleman whether or not he is going to give us the opportunity——

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman insists on his point, I would rather withdraw my request.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I will withdraw it if you are not going to waste too much time.

Mr. BLANTON. The Senate has added $2,500,000 to that bill over and above what the House put in. Is the gentleman going to give us an opportunity to vote on those raises before he agrees to them in conference?

Mr. CRAMTON. I could not promise that as to all of them, but there are some of them as to which I could. For instance, there is an item of half a million dollars for Howard University that I would be obliged to bring back under the rules.

Mr. BLANTON. How about those matters out in Idaho?

Mr. CRAMTON. One of them, you will remember, I reported to the House.

Mr. BLANTON. But they are new items, so far as the House is concerned.

Mr. CRAMTON. My impression is that it went out in the House on a point of order. I am obliged to give a separate vote on that.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman promises to give us an opportunity to vote on that?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will promise to give an opportunity to the House to vote on that matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. CARTER.

GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 30 minutes next Monday, following the reading of the Journal, on the accessibility of the Grand Canyon National Park.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to speak for 30 minutes next Monday, following the reading of the Journal, on the Grand Canyon National Park. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to find out the attitude of the majority leader on that question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall certainly not object.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I certainly shall not object, but the gentleman over there is so anxious to proceed when I want to talk that I want to find out his attitude.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman can talk now, so far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UPSHAW. I wish to call the attention of my colleagues to the entertainment to be given in the caucus room to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock by Booth Lowrey, the gifted brother of our colleague. It will be an inspiring and entertaining hour.

EDUCATION.

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a message by the Governor of New Jersey to the joint session of the New Jersey Legislature on the subject of education.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I submit the following message addressed by Governor Silzer to the joint session of the New Jersey Legislature on February 25, 1924:

To the Legislature:

I come to-night to counsel with you on the subject of education. It is clearly the most important thing we have to deal with in our State.

It is our business to see that our children get the best education possible. We are obliged to make our system of education both efficient and economical. Our duty is to the children and, back of them, to their parents, the taxpayers of the entire State.

No single department costs so much to conduct, for the people of New Jersey annually expend $46,000,000 for education.

Any business corporation spending $46,000,000 yearly for purely commercial purposes and profit would exercise the greatest care and scrutiny to secure efficiency and economy. Auditors would be employed, as well as supervisors, efficiency experts, and other well-paid, highly qualified men. By this method have the great business enterprises of the Nation been built up by our captains of industry.

In our public administration we usually adopt the course of least resistance and of least friction—the course of drifting until we reach a place where we come upon the rocks or see that we can drift no further. Then we stop, make slight changes in our course, and continue the journey, sure to come upon the rocks again.

In a matter of such great importance we can not continue this course. We must adopt the same methods which have built up our large industries and made this country great.

I do not mean to imply any criticism of those conscientious officers, boards, and teachers who give such unselfish and patriotic thought and attention to this work. What I do mean to say is that periodically we must examine ourselves in order to see whether we are getting the proper results.

In 1911 a legislative committee investigated the school question and made a number of recommendations which were adopted with resulting benefit to our schools. For 13 years there has been no further investigation. These 13 years, with the changes brought about by the war, the increasing complication of modern education, and its vast expense, have entirely changed conditions.

It is true that during that time our boards and those interested in the schools have done much for their advancement. The opportunity, however, for investigation by our State board of education and others is exceedingly limited, because they have neither the time, the money, nor the power to do this work.

In my judgment, the time has arrived when a thorough survey should be made of our entire school system in order to correct such evils as may exist, and to put into effect such improved methods as may be of advantage.

There are at present in the State 693,342 pupils attending school. We have 2,191 school buildings, representing an investment of $151,796,312.20. There are 21,644 teachers employed, all of which indicates the vastness and complexity of the problem.

In 1920 $1,200,000,000 was spent throughout the United States for education, an increase of 100 per cent over 1910.

In 1920 education took 36 per cent of the total State and local expenditures, as compared with 26½ per cent in 1915.

In 1920 the highest expenditure was 44.7 per cent, the lowest 16.1 per cent, New Jersey being eighth in the column of States. As I stated before, the present yearly cost is $46,000,000.

COMPLAINTS.

During the last few years numerous complaints and criticisms have been made of our school system. There are many people who believe that there is too much time spent upon what they call "fads and frills." In this category are included such subjects as basket ball and football, directed play, folk dances, intelligence tests, Palmer method of writing, business training, domestic science, drawing, music, modern language, manual training, public speaking, promiscuous reading to pupils, salesmanship, sewing, cooking, and stenography and typewriting.

These same critics complain that we are neglecting the primary education of our children; that the fundamentals are not being firmly implanted in their minds, and that too much time is being spent on subjects which will be of little or no use to the children in after life.

We learn that out of 298 high-school graduates who took an examination for admission to a State normal school 98 failed.

At another time 129 were examined and 70 failed.

Recently 17 normal-school graduates took an examination to teach in the schools of Irvington; 1 passed and 16 failed. Some received marks as low as 45½ per cent; in other subjects the marks ranged from 40 per cent to zero. The median in arithmetic was 30 per cent.

The questions that naturally arise are: What is wrong with this normal school? What is wrong with these graduates? Do we want our children taught by such teachers?

"A vicious circle," said a recent educational writer, "is drawn when the normal schools blame the high schools for not sending them better material; the high schools blame the grammar schools for sending along pupils insufficiently prepared, and the grammar school snaps back that they would do better work if the normal schools furnished them better teachers."

We spend $660,000 yearly for medical inspection. Is the inspection systematic and economical? Is there proper coordination between departments? Do educational laws need revising and codifying? Is proper progress being made in the preparation of textbooks? Is there uniformity of curriculum?

Is the term at normal school long enough to properly train teachers? Are we teaching enough of pedagogy? Have we too many daily subjects for pupils in the elementary departments?

Shall we segregate defective children and teach them useful manual work, or permit them to remain with other classes, trying to teach them that which they can not grasp?

Are teachers' institutes functioning as planned?

These and hundreds of other questions are being asked every day by those most interested in our schools.

Numerous criticisms are being made of the conduct of our schools and of the results obtained. Whether these criticisms are well founded or not I do not know. But I do know that we ought to ascertain whether these criticisms are well founded or not. This is our clear duty. If we find that there is nothing in these criticisms, then the critics will be silenced. On the other hand, if we find that they are well founded, then the evils can and should be speedily corrected. We have no right to leave the matter in the present uncertain state.

COST OF SCHOOLS.

In these times of high taxes it is but natural that there should be a great deal of criticism of the type and character of schools erected and of their high cost.

The value of school properties increased in 1923 over 1922 from $133,111,171 to $151,800,000, or nearly $19,000,000.

In 1914 the value was $58,000,000, the increase from 1914 to 1923 being nearly $100,000,000 or nearly 200 per cent.

Disbursement for purchase of land and erection of buildings during the last five years was as follows:

1920	5,467,458
1921	12,464,293
1922	14,279,157

This shows an increase of about $17,000,000 in five years.

In the last five years $6,525,420 has been expended on buildings for high-school use only to accommodate 11,400 pupils.

In one city a high-school building cost approximately $2,000,000; in another, $1,016,000; in another a junior high school cost $1,400,000.

In even smaller districts with low ratables large sums are spent.

Applications are constantly being made for the passage of bills by the legislature to raise the bond limit so new and expensive schools may be built.

In the building of schools we find included in them large offices, swimming pools, organs, gymnasiums, kitchens, sewing rooms, manual-training rooms, large auditoriums, designed not for educational but rather for community purposes, and many other things of like character. These may all be necessary and advisable, but in view of the criticism we ought to find out. We ought to express our approval if they are correct and our disapproval if they are not, and so end these discussions.

INCOME.

Let us examine our sources of income, those which go to make up the $46,000,000 expended yearly, to determine whether there is any need for correction or improvement.

It is quite evident that with the natural increase in the number of school children from year to year, this will be a continuing and progressive and troublesome problem.

A comparison of the number of pupils enrolled during the last five years is as follows:

1920	623,284
1921	640,765
1922	678,734
1923	693,342

This shows an annual increase of 24,097 during this five-year period.

EXPENDITURES.

We must also examine our method of expending the $46,000,000, to determine whether there is waste, and to determine whether we are getting value received. There are continuing demands for schools and school facilities which will have to be met. For this we must be prepared. We must look to the future and be ready to meet it.

Each year the State officials are confronted with the necessity of reducing requests for appropriations for worthy objects. To illustrate: It was found necessary, on account of insufficient revenue this year, to decline the request of the State Board of Education for the completion of the school for the deaf. This school is a veritable fire trap. From it the younger children have been removed. The older children should also be removed at once, but buildings are not available because the funds are not to be had.

New normal schools are required from time to time, as well as other units in our vast educational system.

Education consists not only of a fundamental and intermediary education, but in high-school and college education. Since the war there has been an increasing demand for high-school education, as illustrated by the following figures:

Number of pupils entering high school (including repeaters):

1920	24,297
1921	26,869
1922	31,484

This shows an increase of 11,031 during the five-year period, or 50 per cent over the number entering in 1919.

Evidently the young men who went to the front were brought to a realization of the value of education and have made up their minds to have it and to see that the younger members of their families have it.

Our State is most fortunate, in the matter of higher education, in having within its borders institutions which are not surpassed by any in the United States—such institutions as Princeton University, Rutgers College, Stevens Institute, and Seton Hall. Most of these are private institutions, devoted to the education of those who can afford to pay the fees. The State college (Rutgers), however, has a number of free scholarships and is doing excellent work along educational and scientific and agricultural lines. In considering the question of education we can not neglect these demands and needs for higher education.

TEACHERS' RETIREMENT FUND.

Under a State statute our teachers are retired after a certain number of years of service. Under that statute the State is called upon to appropriate nearly $2,000,000 each year to provide the necessary funds for this purpose. Whether the present method is scientifically accurate and financially sound, and whether it expresses the policy which the States should continue for its protection and the protection of these teachers, is a question that should be examined.

THE PROBLEM.

We must determine how we are going to get the funds to provide the necessary facilities for the educational purposes above outlined.

In what I have said I have but touched the surface of the educational problem. There are many questions which will have to be taken up and examined.

According to the latest United States Census there are in New Jersey 127,661 people who can not read or write, over the age of 10 years. Of these, 911 are between the ages of 10 and 15 years of age. Of this 911, 283 are of native parentage.

These must be taken care of.

Our children must be thoroughly grounded in the fundamentals, and those who desire higher education must be given the facilities.

We can not permit our children, through our neglect and carelessness, to grow up in ignorance or to be half educated. We must make of them enlightened and helpful citizens. We can not permit them to drift back into ignorance and into that class so sadly exploited by others who have more knowledge.

We now have an educational system of which we are proud. We have made great advances in this work. We stand high among the States in our accomplishment. We must not stop now. Our goal should be the best, for nothing is too good for the children of our State.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

I would therefore recommend that the governor be authorized to appoint a committee of nine to make a survey of our entire educational system, the committee to be composed of the nine best qualified persons who can be found. I suggest nine in order that the committee may be large enough to divide itself into sections for the study of particular problems, following this study by a joint conference of the full committee on all questions.

I have not suggested a legislative commission because I realize the sacrifices which members of the legislature must make, not only during the pre-election period but afterwards in the legislative session. It is not fair to ask them to make further sacrifices. Those to be secured to take a place on such a commission must be those who can devote themselves to it and who at the same time have a deep and abiding interest in the solution of this important question as well as a patriotic desire to help the children of the State in which they live.

I would recommend an appropriation of $75,000 so that the committee may secure such expert advice and help as may be necessary to get the best results. This amount is small when we consider an annual expenditure of $46,000,000. It may not be necessary to use all of it, but it should be available.

I commend these thoughts and recommendations to your earnest consideration, and trust that in the interest of the schools of our State and the education of our children and their future well-being you will take prompt action.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE S. SILZER, Governor.

Attest:

FREDERIC M. P. PEARSE,
Secretary to the Governor.

EXPUNGING REMARKS FROM THE RECORD.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to a speech printed in the RECORD under leave to extend by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHAELSON] on the subject of water diversion of Lake Michigan. During his speech he criticized very severely a Member of the United States Senate. He not only criticizes him but practically imputes to him motives of dishonesty.

Mr. BLANTON. Is he present, Mr. MICHAELSON?

Mr. MICHAELSON. Yes; he is here.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am glad the gentleman is here, because I felt it my duty, whether he was here or not, that I must call the attention of the House to what I regard as a gross breach not only of the privilege of extension but of the well-understood rule that no Member of either body may criticize a Member of the other body. I move that these remarks be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. MICHAELSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MICHAELSON. Provided the truth is told in the article, would it be considered a breach of the rules of the House?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Absolutely a breach of the rules of this House for any gentleman to criticize Members of the other body.

Mr. MICHAELSON. I would like to see the rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman had better consult the rules before he so grossly violates the privileges of this House, as he has done in this instance. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks of the gentleman be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does the gentleman's request apply to all of the remarks or just that portion to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think they should all be expunged, because they are so interwoven it is difficult to separate them.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have a minute to make a statement, as the gentleman from Ohio has had a minute or so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move as a substitute that such portions of the remarks as are violative of the rules be expunged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio did not yield the floor for the purpose of having another motion made.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that these remarks be expunged from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois, as has been suggested?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman in order that he may make any explanation he desires.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a better opportunity should be given——

The SPEAKER. At present the gentleman from Ohio has the floor and the gentleman from Texas is out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to have a quorum present if we are to vote on this matter now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order, because the gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can do that, of course.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 1, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

386. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Cambridge Harbor, Md. SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 1, 1924.

(Legislative day of Friday, February 29, 1924.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOSES in the chair). The Senate resumes the consideration of Senate Resolution 157.

ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate Resolution 157, submitted by Mr. WHEELER on February 13, as modified by him on yesterday, directing a committee to investigate the failure of the Attorney General to prosecute or defend certain criminal and civil actions wherein the Government is interested.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Ferris	Ladd	Sheppard
Ashurst	Fess	La Follette	Shipstead
Ball	Fletcher	Lenroot	Shortridge
Bayard	Frazier	Lodge	Simmons
Borah	George	McKellar	Smith
Brandegee	Gerry	McKinley	Smoot
Brookhart	Gooding	McLean	Stanfield
Broussard	Hale	McNary	Stanley
Bursum	Harris	Mayfield	Stephens
Cameron	Harrison	Moses	Swanson
Caraway	Heflin	Neely	Trammell
Couzens	Howell	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Walsh, Mont.
Dale	Johnson, Minn.	Oddie	Warren
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Watson
Dill	Jones, Wash.	Ralston	Weller
Edge	Kendrick	Ransdell	Wheeler
Elkins	Keyes	Reed, Pa.	Willis
Ernst	King	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been informed that the President pro tempore, Mr. CUMMINS, does not desire to be intrusted with the appointment of this committee. He thinks it had better be appointed by the Senate. Under those circumstances I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment. The question is then upon agreeing to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. FESS obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

AGRICULTURAL EXPORT COMMISSION.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the report will be received.

Mr. McNARY. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 2012) declaring an emergency in respect to certain agricultural commodities, to promote equality between agricultural commodities and other commodities, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 193) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go to the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the report be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be printed under the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NORRIS. There are two things I want to state.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The first thing I want to do is to ask unanimous consent to submit a minority report within seven days. I would like to state, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that the minority report does not mean that the minority is opposed to the bill which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] has just reported. I will consult with other members of the committee and other Senators before the minority report is made. There is a minority of the committee that favors another bill in preference to the one just reported. There is no misunderstanding in the committee. The Senator from Oregon himself is favorable to the bill I would report, but he prefers the one that he has reported. I want to make that clear.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the other bill?

Mr. NORRIS. It is known as the Norris bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Known by some as the Norris-Sinclair bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. While the Senator from Ohio has yielded to me, I want to make another brief statement to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Regarding the same subject?

Mr. NORRIS. No; a different subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator permit the Chair to put the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Nebraska is granted unanimous consent to file a minority report within seven days, which minority report will be printed as part 2 of the report submitted by the Senator from Oregon.

PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT BY EX-OFFICIALS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, several days ago the Senate passed seven resolutions calling upon the various departments for information. The resolutions were introduced by me. I would like to have the attention of the Senate, because what I am about to say is really in the nature of a notice to the Senate. I want the Senate to know what I did.

Yesterday I was called on the phone by the Secretary of the Interior, who told me that to comply fully with the resolution which applied to the Department of the Interior would require two or three weeks' time and take a large portion of his force. He called my attention to the various bureaus and branches of the Department of the Interior and wanted to send up some representative to consult with me about the matter. I asked them to come to my office this morning.

Three representatives of the Secretary of the Interior called on me this morning. They called my attention to the fact that to furnish the information called for by my resolution would, if carried out fully, require an examination, for instance, of all the land offices all over the United States and would require an examination of the Patent Office, the Pension Office, and so forth, and that including in it the ex-Members of the House of Representatives would include several thousand names, for which they would have to make an examination in all the various branches and bureaus of the department.

I made this suggestion to them: They are going to report it to the Secretary of the Interior and also to the heads of other departments, the Secretary of Commerce, and, I believe, one of the other Secretaries, with whom they had conferences, that are in a somewhat similar position. I said that in my judgment, if they had to do that, the information would come very late and would not be so useful, and that the Senate did not care for any information as it applied to certain branches like the Land Office, the Pension Office, and the Patent Office. I suggested that they should eliminate also from consideration under the resolution ex-Members of the House of Representatives. That would take away the largest number for which they would have to search and confine the resolution to ex-Members of the Senate and ex-Cabinet officials. I told them I would call the attention of the Senate to this suggestion, and that in my judgment the Senate would make no objection to that kind of a limitation; that they could make the report that far, and when the report was in, if the Senate desired them to go further, it could so indicate.

So I presume, unless there is some objection from the Senate, the report will come from all the departments confined only to ex-Cabinet officials and ex-Senators. I desired to make that statement to the Senate in order that the Senate might understand the matter.

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask what difference there is between an "ex-Senator" and an "ex-Congressman"?

Mr. NORRIS. An "ex-Congressman" includes both Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, while an "ex-Senator" does not include Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COUZENS. Why should ex-Members of the House of Representatives be excluded?

Mr. NORRIS. Mainly for the purpose of carrying the investigation forward without taking so much time and requiring so many employees to do the work. The resolutions call for the names of ex-Senators and ex-Members of the House who within two years after the time they shall have served, beginning in 1918 up to the present, have appeared as attorneys before any of the branches or bureaus of any of the departments of the Government. The House of Representatives is composed of over 400 Members, and there are more changes in that body than there are in the Senate. It may readily be seen that it will take a great deal more time if ex-Members of the House are also included, especially if we go into all the ramifications and branches of the subject.

Mr. COUZENS. But could we not include those who have been Members of the House of Representatives within the last two years?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the Senate can take any action it sees proper.

Mr. COUZENS. The practice referred to in the resolution is against the law?

Mr. NORRIS. It is. I should like to have the resolution apply to all ex-Members of the House of Representatives, but that would make the investigation and work of the departments much greater and would take much more time than if we confine it to ex-Senators. I thought, since they are Senate resolutions, it would be very appropriate if we confined the information to ex-Senators; and that the House of Representatives could pass a resolution relative to the matter if it wished to. When the information comes in, if it then only partially answers the inquiry, the Senate may ask for the additional information and in time obtain it.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it the opinion of the Senator that it would impose a very great additional task if we should include in the inquiry those who had been Members of the House of Representatives within the last two years?

Mr. NORRIS. If we should adopt that course, it would lessen the labor imposed by the resolutions.

Mr. COUZENS. I should like to see that information included.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to see all of that information included, but when I was confronted with the enormous task which was before the departments and the way it would interfere with their routine work I thought that, at least, for the present, we might confine the request for information to ex-Senators and former members of the Cabinet. Then, when the information comes in, we can, of course, later ask for additional information.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5078) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, and for other purposes; agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. MURPHY, and Mr. CARTER were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 6715) to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Toledo, Ohio, favoring the enactment of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CURTIS presented a resolution adopted by the Horton Federated Shop Crafts, of the Central Labor Union, American Federation of Labor, at Horton, Kans., favoring the prosecution and conviction of persons responsible for the killing and maiming of innocent employees through violation of the Federal laws relative to boiler inspection and safety appliances, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Horton Community Chamber of Commerce, of Horton, Kans., protesting against making any amendment to the transportation act of 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial, numerously signed, of members of the Santa Fe Supervisors' Association, of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway system, of Ottawa, Kans., remonstrating against the making of any substantial change in the transportation act of 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the Rotary Club of Kansas City, Kans., favoring the enactment of legislation granting increased compensation to postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, Beth Horon Lodge, No. 599, of Kansas City, Kans., protesting against the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce, of Marysville, Kans., favoring the passage of Senate bill 2012, creating a Federal agricultural export commission, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution of the American Legion Auxiliary, Kansas Department, of Topeka, Kans., favoring the acceleration of the work in the Veterans' Bureau and the employment, if necessary, of a more adequate force, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from Loeb Apte Co., of Atlanta; and of Freeman & Co., T. H. Halliburton, E. M. Burney, Ouzts Mitchell & Whaley, and Howard Produce Co., of Macon, all in the State of Georgia, remonstrating against inclusion of a broker's tax in House bill 6715, the revenue bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented telegrams and a letter in the nature of memorials from the Blackshear Tobacco Board of Trade, of Blackshear; E. L. Meadows and S. B. Meadows, of Vidalia; the Chamber of Commerce, the Planters' Tobacco Warehouse, A. W. Gaskins, and the First Bank of Nashville, of Nashville; and A. T. Coppage, the Hahira Board of Trade, and J. E. Massey, of Hahira, all in the State of Georgia, remonstrating against the inclusion of an extra tobacco tax in House bill 6715, the revenue bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. OWEN presented the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, R. A. Sneed, secretary of state of the State of Oklahoma, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached is a true copy of senate resolution 10, adopted by the senate February 6, 1924, the original of which is now on file and a matter of record in this office.

In testimony whereof I hereto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of State.

Done at the city of Oklahoma City this 12th day of February, A. D. 1924.

[SEAL.]

R. A. SNEED,
Secretary of State.
UNA LEE ROBERTS,
Assistant Secretary of State.

Senate resolution 10 (by Cornett), memorializing the Congress of the United States to defeat that part of Senate bill No. 2065, by HARRELD, which provides for the repeal of 1 per cent gross production tax on royalties received by the Osage Tribe of Indians from oil and gas produced in Osage County, Okla.

Whereas on January 17, 1924, Hon. J. W. HARRELD, of Oklahoma, introduced in the Senate of the United States bill No. 2065, which provides, in part, for the repeal of section 5 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1921, providing as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay, through the proper officers of the Osage Agency to Osage County, Okla., an additional sum equal to 1 per cent of the amount received by the Osage Tribe of Indians as royalties from production of oil and gas, which sum shall be used by said county only for the construction and maintenance of roads and bridges therein."

Whereas the repeal of said act would mean a great loss to the county of Osage and the State of Oklahoma as well: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oklahoma, That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to defeat and oppose that part of Senate bill No. 2065 which provides for the repeal of said act of Congress approved March 3, 1921; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Oklahoma.

Adopted by the senate this the 6th day of February, 1924.

WASH E. HUDSON,
Acting President pro tempore of the Senate.

Correctly enrolled.

W. C. LEWIS,
Chairman Committee of Enrolled and Engrossed Bills.

I ask that the bill which I now introduce may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received, and the reference requested by the Senator from Utah will be made.

The bill (S. 2703) to prevent the use of the mails and other communication facilities in furtherance of margin or bucket shop transactions was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROMOTION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. BURSUM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war, and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANKING SYSTEM.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I submit a resolution and ask that it may be read and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 182) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate be, and is hereby, directed to formulate and present to the Senate for its consideration a bill which will effectually provide for the use of the surplus and current net earnings of the Federal reserve banking system as a guaranty for the prompt payment of the just claims of the depositors of all member banks of said system.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6715) to reduce and equalize taxation, to provide revenue, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate Resolution 157, submitted by Mr. WHEELER on February 13, as modified by him on yesterday, directing a committee to investigate the failure of the Attorney General to prosecute or defend certain criminal and civil actions wherein the Government is interested.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have been content to remain quiet during the months while I have been a Member of the Senate, as I thought it might befit a new Member of the body. I had not intended to participate in this debate at all, and I did not determine to do so until a remark was made at the close of yesterday's session by my friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in reference to the proceedings in the other body on impeachment proceedings. I have reread what the Senator said yesterday, and I now want to absolve him from the first impressions that I had, that he was charging that that proceeding was an unfair and rather a partial examination. The Senator from Nebraska did not make that statement. However, he stated that he had been told that the proceeding was not fair. I think, in view of the fact that such a statement has been made on the floor of the Senate, which gives it a certain prestige and carries with it more or less responsibility, something ought to be said in regard to that proceeding. I assure the Senate that I shall not violate the rules of the Senate in any reference that I shall make in regard to the action of the other House. I shall not only respect the rules as I know them but I shall hope to avoid any insinuation of any sort that might reflect upon any action of any Member of that body.

I watched the proceedings of that investigation as carefully as could any Member of the House of Representatives not a member of the committee. There were reasons for my doing so, because impeachment proceedings are unusual; very few in our history have been a matter of record; and when charges are made such as were made in the House of Representatives against the Attorney General—seven in number, quite severe—it behooved every Member of the House to follow the proceedings carefully, because he was going to be called on to vote on the question.

It has been stated here that the progress of the proceedings turned into a persecution of the proponent of the impeachment resolution. While that is not the case, yet there was a pretty rigid examination and some very sharp remarks were made both in the committee and in the House when the report of the committee was being acted upon. I do not think that any responsible Member of the Senate, either on this floor or outside of the Senate, would want to risk his reputation for fairness by a statement that a committee made up as that committee was made up would be partial in its proceedings.

I should like to refresh the memory of the Senate as to the personnel of that committee. It was headed by Mr. Volstead, who had been a Member of the House for 20 years, who is recognized everywhere as a great lawyer, and who has always been regarded as impartial and very fair-minded. On that committee also was Mr. GEORGE S. GRAHAM, of Philadelphia, eminent in his legal attainments and without doubt one of the great lawyers of the country. On that committee was Mr. DYER, elected from Missouri first in the Sixty-second Congress and, with the exception of one term, continuously a Member of the body since then up to the present time, and still a Member of the House.

On that committee was Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts, universally accredited as not only one of the best parliamentarians of the House but easily one of the best jurists and one of the fairest of all fair-minded men. I think nobody who knows Mr. Walsh would think for a moment that he could under any sort of pressure be induced to render an unfair decision. The fact of his fairness has been affirmed by an appointment to the judiciary by the late President because of his high eminence in the law, and he voluntarily left the House for that position.

On that committee was the distinguished Member from the Lincoln district of Nebraska, Mr. Frank Reavis, universally accredited an eminent lawyer and a fair-minded jurist. I am sure that those who know Frank Reavis as I know him would not for a moment charge him with anything that is unfair, especially in a judicial proceeding.

On that committee were such men as David G. Classon, of Wisconsin; Judge BOIES, of the Sioux Falls district of Iowa; Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON, of the Sioux Falls district of South Dakota; ex-Gov. RICHARD YATES, of Illinois, son of former Governor Yates, the war Governor of Illinois. Mr. YATES twice was elected as Representative at Large from the State of Illinois and, without doubt, if he is a man with an unfair mind he would not have secured such an indorsement as his enormous majority indicated at the polls in that election.

On that committee also was Mr. Goodykoontz, of West Virginia; Walter Chandler, of New York; IRA G. HERSEY, of Maine; my own colleague, Mr. FOSTER, of Ohio; Mr. MICHENER, of Michigan; and Mr. HICKEY, of Indiana. I know all of these men personally and professionally. I am certain that none of them is capable of sitting on a case like this and rendering a partial decision from the facts that are adduced.

But, Members of the Senate, I am not satified to limit the observation to these members. I wish to call your attention to Mr. HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Texas, one of the brainy men of the other body, one of the clearest-headed men whom I know, and without doubt free from anything that would lead him to a partial decision when a man's reputation is at stake. I have known this man as a leader along lines on which he has impressed himself on the country.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will ask the Senator if Mr. SUMNERS did not disagree to the report of the committee?

Mr. FESS. Mr. SUMNERS disagreed with the committee on just one question.

Mr. CARAWAY. On every question.

Mr. FESS. He disagreed on one question. Mr. KELLER refused to come before the committee to testify upon the charges he made, at the same time indicating that he had the facts to prove them. Mr. SUMNERS wanted Mr. KELLER subpœnaed, but the committee voted that it was not the proper function of the committee to subpœna a Member of the House. Mr. SUMNERS disagreed with the committee on that one point, but agreed with the committee upon the question of discharging the committee from further consideration of the measure.

On that committee sat Governor MONTAGUE. Need I make any comment on this ex-Governor of Virginia, who was appointed by Grover Cleveland district attorney in the Old Dominion State, who was elected by his people as State's attorney, a position which he held for four years; who was elected Governor of the State of Virginia, and reelected; stood as a delegate at large in the national convention of 1904; came to the House of Representatives, where he was recognized by everybody, Democrats and Republicans, as one of the fearless men of that body, and without a doubt to-day he is one of the most promising, forward-looking, and eminent statesmen of either branch of Congress? He not only voted to discharge the committee from further consideration of these charges, seven in number, but he made an eminent argument on the floor of the House, pointing out that there was no foundation whatever for the charges that had thus been made.

Who is there on this floor that would charge that Governor MONTAGUE is a partial-minded man, or that he would render an unfair decision upon a matter of this sort? It strikes me, my colleagues, that the Senate is reaching a rather low level. I hope this is not the school of scandal. I hope it is not the sluiceway through which flow all sorts of charges, supported and unsupported, to bring discredit in the minds of the public against public men. I sincerely hope that this distinguished body is not to-day on trial before the public mind, wondering whether, after all, everybody connected with the Government is not crooked, because of irresponsible statements that are bandied first from one to another and then vice versa. The United States Senate is remembered to-day only by those who read the textbooks as the forum in which operated the Calhouns, the Clays, the Websters, the Sewards, the Shermans, men of the type whose utterances to-day are commonplace, read by the children of our land whose only conception of the United States Senate is that received from reading those utterances. I sincerely hope that the public mind is not being diverted from the standard reached by this body under the leadership of such men as have made it distinguished to the low level where we are not a legislative body, if we judge from the events of the last two months; we are not a deliberative body, if I have a right to judge from what I have seen in the last two months; but we are an inquisition, and we have become a sluiceway, and if suspicion is raised against any man the only qualification is, "Has he entered public service?" Has it come to the point where the only safety is for a man to be a pauper, a do-nothing, a nonentity; otherwise he is to be charged with being subject to the predatory interests of the country and with undertaking to cover up what ought to be uncovered? I say, Mr. President, that this proceeding for the last two months has been a shame and a disgrace to America, and we ought to be ashamed of such a performance as has gone on.

I absolve certain things that have been done. I want to let it be known, as I have let it be known to the public, that the attitude of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is most admirable. He has done a service to the country. The only thing that was in that joint resolution, for which I voted, that I wished had come out of it was the preamble. While it is not my business and not my province and probably not my privilege to comment upon certain things that I think ought not to take place in this body, yet it seems to me that we ought not to permit a resolution to be a means by which the preamble can drag all sorts of stump speeches into legislation. So far as I am concerned, in committee or out, I shall use my influence to prevent that; and if resolutions coming to the committees of which I happen to be a member persist in dragging in irrelevant and unauthorized and irresponsible utterances in the form of stump speeches, I shall reserve my right to vote against the resolution in the committees, and if I am doing wrong I am ready to resign from the committees.

Legislation should have a certain standard, and it should not stoop to the level of charging everybody irresponsibly, and assuming that those charged are guilty, when everybody knows that the genius of American liberty is to presume that the one charged is innocent until he is proved guilty. The only thing that I did not like in the joint resolution of the Senator from Montana was the preamble. We could not take that out; but with it in, rather than be misconstrued as being opposed to investigating the legality of these leases, I joined with other Members here, and voted for it.

Mr. President, what I am saying is not against investigations. What I am saying is not against what the Senate did on the leasing resolution. I have no doubt that had it not been for the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], we should have been thrashing out this thing on this floor, as if the Senate were a mere inquisition; but he took the lead to say, "This is not a legislative matter." I use his words. "This is a judicial matter. This is not for the Senate. This is for the courts"; and he proceeded upon that basis, and we all joined him, ready to go to the courts to determine the legality of these leases. While I am not going to prejudge, I shall not be at all surprised if, when the matter is tested in the courts under the direction of the strongest legal talent that we could secure—securing one eminent lawyer from Pennsylvania, and a very eminent lawyer from my own State—I should not be surprised if, when we go into the legality of those leases, they should be found to be legal. I mean by that that after all our province is to see that the court, which is the right process, shall determine the legality or otherwise of these leases. That we voted for; but see the limit to which we have come! As soon as that decision was made, then comes in a resolution to call upon the President, to direct him or invite him to ask the withdrawal of a member of his Cabinet.

Mr. President, the one feature that differentiates the American system from every other government on earth is the coordinate equality of the departments of government. That is the one thing that distinguishes us from every other government. Lord Bryce, in his American Commonwealth, commented upon that beyond any other foreign publicist who is living or has lived. In that work he said that in the respect that each government has the legislative, executive, and judicial functions, we are not different from any other government of history, for all of them have the three functions. It was Blackstone who said: "Intelligence to make the laws, good will to interpret the laws, and power to enforce the laws"; but some governments put the three in one. There you have a despotism, if the power goes to the executive. Other governments put the three in the legislative, as is rapidly coming to be the case in Great Britain. Therefore Great Britain in many respects is more democratic than is our country.

Great Britain's power, both in legislation and interpretation and enforcement, is not only in Parliament but it is in the House of Commons. It is America, our Government alone, that makes an executive here, a legislative there, a judicial elsewhere, each independent, each interdependent, no one consulting the other in the province of exercising its function. And yet, with that the very genius of American life, here we have this body sending to the President a resolution directing or inviting him to withdraw from his Cabinet a member that certain people here think can be played upon for political purposes. We not only voted for that resolution, but we went further and voted to send it to the President, inviting him to give us the spanking that we so well deserved, and that we got.

That is the next step that was taken. Now comes this one—the step that is pending here to investigate the Attorney General.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thought the President was acting within his rights when, in his New York speech, he asked the people of the country to write to Congress and advise them what they should do in matters of legislation?

Mr. FESS. I do not know whether the President made any such statement as that. I heard the speech myself. I do not now recall any such statement. If he made that statement I should criticize it. I was one of the men in the other body who called attention to the tendency to extend the executive function over the legislative in the last administration, and I did it, not because I disliked anyone but, on the other hand, because I admired greatly the man who was doing it.

This resolution now comes on. I have no objection to it. This is what the Attorney General would like to have done. He wants the right that is guaranteed to us, that everyone charged shall have a hearing. I wonder with what interest our Democratic friends recall the terrific fight that was made in the Constitutional Convention and immediately afterwards, on establishing a bill of rights. Only a short while ago I heard a distinguished Senator make a very eloquent speech that I greatly enjoyed, and everybody present was edified. In that speech he exalted the idea of the civil rights bill, and he accurately and authoritatively quoted George Mason, of Virginia, as the author of the famous civil rights bill that was adopted even before the Declaration of Independence was adopted.

As he said, that has come to be the civil rights statement, or the bill of rights statement, in almost every State constitution of the 48 States of our great Nation. The civil rights bill was not put into the Constitution of the United States. A terrific fight took place as to whether it should be made a part of the Constitution. Certain elements in the convention said that the Bill of Rights had no part as an organic portion of the instrument, and they suggested that, instead of making the Bill of Rights a part of the organic law, it be submitted in the form of amendments, and that the States be allowed to pass on those amendments. Twelve amendments were submitted, 10 of which were adopted, and those 10 are the famous Bill of Rights which was originally outlined by the great Virginia statesman and which have been applauded ever since by Democratic leaders, especially by Thomas Jefferson, who was not a Member of the Constitutional Convention, but who was a close student of what was going on.

What is in that Bill of Rights? The very first item is the right of liberty of religious worship; then the right of liberty of expression, then liberty of assembly, and liberty of the press. Then there is a provision that the home shall be protected, and following that the fifth and sixth amendments, which guarantee to anybody charged a presentation of the charges against him and a trial by an impartial jury.

Members of the Senate, that is fundamental in America; that is the very genesis of our institutions; and this body is not going to deny the right to be heard to one charged with an offense. Neither will they, I hope, create a committee which is prejudiced one way or the other so as to defeat the fair, impartial trial of the case.

I have read the names of those suggested for the committee, and I have nothing to say against the personnel. I would have preferred that some one less convinced that there is guilt already, without any investigation, be placed on it than my good friend the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], although I am willing, naturally, to submit to what the Senate shall do.

I have absolute confidence in the good faith of and have the greatest admiration personally for my friend the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART], a lovable character; yet he will not take offense when I say to him that I would prefer to have the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on the committee, who took exception last night to certain things, for the reason that my friend from Iowa has been for years connected in his life and thought with certain drifts in industry which make certain acts of Mr. Daugherty very offensive to him. I hope that the members of the committee will not be so prejudiced that fair treatment can not be given, and I hope I am saying nothing offensive to the Senator from Iowa.

I am not speaking as a partisan of Mr. Daugherty. As those who know me best know, and those who do not know me so well will learn, I have never been one of the great admirers of Mr. Daugherty; but I have never doubted his honesty, I have never doubted his probity, I have never doubted his integrity, and, as far as I can, I shall go to the limit to see that he be given a fair trial. I mentioned the senior Senator from Nebraska, because I have known him for so many years; I know him as a fighter; I knew him as a four-fisted fighter, but never striking below the belt. That is the reason I hope the senior Senator from Nebraska may go on this committee.

I shall not resist the resolution. I shall vote for the investigation to go on. I do, however, want to absolve the committee in the other House from being a prejudiced committee or rendering a partial decision. Certain charges were made. They were gone into. There were 21 members of the committee, which was a standing committee, and one of the biggest in the House. Every member of the committee was a lawyer, every one a lawyer of distinction. They came out of the committee with a report. One man voted against the resolution to discharge the committee from further action, while the others stood against the charges being at all established, and therefore voted to dismiss them.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. Just at that point, does my colleague recall the vote in the House on the committee report?

Mr. FESS. The vote was 206 to 78, and among the 206 were a great many Democratic Members.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Before the Senator concludes I want to verify for his recollection the portion of the President's speech in New York to which I have referred and which appears at page 2384 of the RECORD. He stated:

> But the people of the Nation must understand that this is their fight. They alone can win it. Unless they make their wishes known to the Congress without regard to party, this bill will not pass. I urge them to renewed efforts.

Mr. FESS. I state to the Senator from Colorado that I still question the wisdom of the statement. The Senator will see that that is only expressing the right of petition, which we find guaranteed in the first amendment of the Constitution. However, I doubt the wisdom of the President even taking that position over the legislative body. I say that frankly; I would say it against any President.

Mr. ADAMS. May I be permitted to say just a further word? If the Senator will pardon me, I think that answers in part the argument he made, that if the President feels that it is proper to have his opinion not only expressed by himself to Congress but reinforced by his urging upon the public, which certainly is a path which he has laid out, it is not improper for Congress to follow in expressing their opinion as to matters which they have investigated in order that he might have the benefit of the opinion of Congress, not that Congress is trespassing upon his constitutional powers, but merely expressing to the President their opinion, based upon matters which the Congress has investigated in the exercise of their constitutional powers.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Colorado will recognize that the Constitution authorizes the President to make his views on the state of the Union known to the Congress. He does it either through a written statement, in the form of a message, or a spoken statement from the desk. Everybody admits that is a proper function. I think most people also would say that the right of petition could be recommended by the President. I have my serious doubts as to whether the President should do it.

Mr. ADAMS. Would the Senator go far enough to say that the President would have power to have a bill drafted down to the final dotting of the "i's" and crossing of the "t's," and sent to Congress, and then insist that the country coerce Congress, the legislative body, into passing that particular measure?

Mr. FESS. I do not know that anybody ever did that except President Wilson. I do not suppose anybody else would do it.

Mr. ADAMS. On my desk is a copy of the Mellon plan, prepared in one of the executive departments and sent here, as I understand it, with the determined effort that the bill shall be passed just as drawn and just as submitted to Congress.

Mr. FESS. I would say to the Senator from Colorado that if it passes just as it was drafted, it will not be because it was written by the Secretary of the Treasury or recommended by the President; it will be the judgment of the House and Senate, in their decision, and then the President has the legislative function, if he wants to exercise it, either to sign or veto the bill. That, in my judgment, is the legitimate course to be pursued by both Congress and the Executive.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has made a very severe arraignment of the Senate. I never have heard a worse one. He has said that the proceedings in this body for the last two months have been disgraceful and scandalous. Granting that, I hope the Senator will not take his seat until he admits that the proceedings disclosed before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys were scandalous and disgraceful, and perhaps the Senate had some reason for its conduct, considering the subject matter it had to deal with.

Mr. FESS. I would say to the Senator from Massachusetts that if he wants to be regular and deliberative he will wait for the report of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and then act upon their report. He will not drag in a lot of unsubstantiated rumors and undertake to establish the facts by a mere whispering campaign, as this thing has become.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Was not the resolution we adopted reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys?

Mr. FESS. It was.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does not everybody in the country know that for the first time in years a Cabinet officer has corruptly transferred irreplaceable assets of the Government? Why does not the Senator denounce those responsible for the public scandals instead of reflecting on the conduct of the Senate?

Mr. FESS. The Senator is gratuitous in that. He says "everybody knows." If everybody knows, why should we have the investigation? We are waiting for the proper procedure in a court of justice to determine the facts, and when those facts are in, then the Senator can make his speech, and he probably will revise his utterances.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does anybody dispute now that a member of the Cabinet received money improperly for transferring assets of the Government to private interests? Does the Senator dispute that? Does he want more evidence along that line? The Senator apparently has no words of condemnation for the fraud and corruption that has caused the Senate to act.

Mr. FESS. I would say to the Senator from Massachusetts that when we reach the point of saying "Does anybody dispute it?" I do not dispute it, but I do not assert it. Neither can the Senator assert it until the facts are all in.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My purpose in asking the Senator the question was to have him at least find some justification to the body of which he is a Member for the conduct he describes, in view of the disclosures which have shocked the country, and which naturally would be reflected here by very sharp, intense, and bitter debate.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in all matters of this kind the difficulty is that a man's views are always colored by the thing in which he is interested and the subject that is being discussed. We can not view the situation throughout the country from Washington. We can not view it from the Senate. There is not a man here who knows the situation throughout the country. Let me illustrate what I mean.

Here is a letter, only one letter of many that come to my desk, asking, "What is the situation in the Senate?" In part, the letter reads:

> It occurs to me that a lot of Senators have a serious case of hysteria, and are exploiting themselves in a way that would better become a corner grocer than what should be a dignified Senator. This is also true in some respects of the other body. It is exasperating to the men of the country to witness such an exhibition of petty politics as now disgraces both the Senate and the House. This is the time for exhibitions of some common sense.

That is only one letter coming from men of balanced minds who believe that the Senate of the United States is to-day on trial. I need no further evidence than the testimony of men who sit in this body who are being thoroughly disgusted with what is going on from day to day, and it is on both sides of the Chamber. It seems to me that it is about time for the Senate of the United States to get back to something like the Constitution that created it. So far as I can go, I propose to vote for the investigation, and I also will vote for the prosecution to the very limit of anyone found to be guilty, but I will not allow any manufactured clamor nor any petty politics nor any organized political régime to lead me to vote against the integrity of a man and assassinate his reputation without his having first a trial. That is un-American, and we ought to be ashamed of such procedure.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, one shudders to think of what would have happened to the Senate if the distinguished Senator [Mr. FESS] who has just taken his seat had not come here. All intelligence and all decency reside with him. All sense of propriety he possesses, and both sides of the Senate are devoid of the dignity they should have and the sense of justice that should actuate them, and therefore, like the schoolmaster, he reads the Senate a lecture.

But I want to say that nobody ever heard of the Senator from Ohio lecturing the Senate except when the Senate was trying to prosecute criminals, and criminals that belong to his party. His first speech in the Senate is to defend the Attorney General, because that is all it means. It is to lecture the Senate so that it shall pack the jury. I think everybody understands the Senator from Ohio and his purpose in reading the Senate a lecture this morning.

He read the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a lecture about discussing the Judiciary Committee of the House as not being quite fair and undertook to show that it was fair and eulogized the membership of that committee. I served six years on that committee. He began by saying—and that is as near the truth as anything else he said—that Mr. Volstead was a great lawyer. God bless your soul, Volstead could not get a license to practice law anywhere unless by waiving his examination. I know something of Volstead. If he were now a Member of the House, I could not discuss him; but to call him a great lawyer is such a flight of imagination that even the Senator from Ohio, I should have thought, would have paused a minute before he paid that tribute.

It may be that the Senate is hysterical. If it is, it is hysterical in trying to see that crime shall be punished and the people's property protected. Only two Senators on the other side are hysterical, like the Senator from Ohio, in seeing that nobody is punished and no public property restored. He ventured the assertion that the contract made by Fall to Sinclair was legal, and even that Doheny and Sinclair were rightfully in possession of Teapot Dome and reserve No. 1. Now, we are apt to find out that Fall, who will not tell where he got the money and first told a deliberate falsehood about it, had an absolute right to sell our naval reserves and sold them legally, and that Sinclair and Doheny had a right to buy them. The people would get a fair trial with a jury of such distinguished men as the Senator from Ohio. The public rights would be preserved and criminals would tremble with that kind of an apologist in the Senate for men who corrupt public officials and for corrupt considerations sell the public property and endanger the very life of America by selling every drop of oil that was to steam our ships in time of war.

We are to hear a lecture of the Senate upon propriety. Oh, you know if we all had such propriety, the people would have some right, indeed, to suspect the Senate did not function, as the Senator from Ohio said. I am sure the Senator from Ohio would entirely approve of what is now disclosed to be a fact, that the Department of Justice turned over the secret code so that the criminals who were being pursued might keep in touch with the Department of Justice and by it be protected.

I should say that the Senator from Ohio could find no more appropriate occasion to rise than in view of that disclosure. He says he wants to vouch for the absolute integrity and high character of Mr. Daugherty, and here we are confronted with the fact that not only did Mr. Daugherty do nothing to help fathom the crookedness of public officials, to help restore public property stolen from the public, but he, on the other hand, lent positive aid by loaning the secret code of the Department of Justice to the criminals in Florida to communicate with criminals in the Department of Justice so that no investigation could be had and no disclosures had. Upon that disclosure the Senator from Ohio rose and said the Senate was hysterical and the Attorney General honest. That sort of recommendation ought to go a long way with everybody. I do not know and the public does not know what all the facts are.

Even Mr. Wile, who is the mouthpiece of the President since he got a cup of coffee and a sandwich on the Mayflower one day, is out in an article this morning—and I hope the Senator from Ohio will read him a lecture for being hysterical—saying that Cautious Cal is also growing nervous, because under the headline, "The President will strike soon for clean régime," Mr. Wile has the following to say:

Calvin Coolidge within a comparatively few weeks will take action in connection with current events at Washington designed to justify the confidence which he feels the country has in him.

A few weeks? How many weeks nobody knows, but sometime, when the cautious President shall have waked up, he is going to say something. Oh, I wish the Senator from Ohio would go down there and say, "Now, Mr. Coolidge, do not get hysterical. Take your time. Do not be swept away by the hysteria or by thieves stealing the public property, but wait. Oh, wait a few months, and after awhile the thing may blow over," because that is the hope of those people who are talking about hysteria now. The article goes on a little further and says:

To nobody, not even his most intimate advisers, has the President thus far confided the nature of the step he will take. Only so much can be said—and it is stated on high authority that before May 1, or perhaps much sooner than that, Mr. Coolidge will resort to measures of a positive kind.

I am so glad that he is not going to be swept away by that hysteria that so excites my friend from Ohio. He is going to take until May 1, but nobody knows what he is going to do. In the meantime he sits in the White House and leaves unanswered the statement that in this important investigation the man who was in the worst of it should have easy and quick access to the White House, because in a telegram sent from Washington one of the reasons urged for putting the private wire of Mr. McLean was "so that you may have quick and easy access to the White House."

They put in charge of that wire the man who was in charge of the confidential wire in the White House, so that there could be no misunderstanding. The same man handles both messages, and he will know what McLean says to Fall and what Fall said to Mr. Slemp after he went to Florida, and for what purpose Slemp was going. They even sent a code message to say to Mr. McLean in Florida that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is taking the 10.35 train. Not a thing could happen but what they were informed, and in order to make the matter absolutely quick and sure they say, "You put in a private wire, and you will have quick and certain connection with the White House."

Oh, if it were not for exciting the distinguished Senator from Ohio to the same kind of hysteria that he so much condemns and so aptly illustrates, I would like for the President to say whether or not he had any communication with those people in Florida. I think he owes it to 100,000,000 of American people, who are swept, as the Senator from Ohio said, by hysteria, to say whether there is anything in the statement that "We want the private wire so we can have quick and easy communication with the White House."

I want to know—and I know the Senator from Ohio condemns me for asking the question—what right Mr. McLean has to have "quick and easy" access to the White House when he was shielding as best he could a criminal that he knew to be a criminal? I would like to know, if it is not too agitating to the Senator from Ohio, who is afraid everyone is going to grow hysterical except himself, why the Attorney General should turn over the secret code to enable criminals and their aiders and abettors to frame a defense? The Senator from Ohio will tell me to wait until the committee shall report.

I remember that same argument was made when I introduced a resolution to cancel the leases. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said that it was a reflection on the committee and ought not to be urged at that time. I know he thought it, but I know, also, that after awhile everybody got interested and even those gentlemen who abhor hysteria voted for a resolution to employ lawyers to try to cancel the leases which the Senator from Ohio now feels are legal. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I would have the courage of my hysteria. I would not have voted for the resolution to have canceled a lease I thought was legal. I would not have stultified myself. I would have been the one outstanding Senator in the Senate. I would have risen in my place and said to the country, "I think this transaction between Fall and Sinclair was proper; I think Fall ought to have sold the leases; I think he ought to have been paid for them, and since I believe that I will not be hysterical; I will be courageous; I will show the country what a Senator ought to be. I vote 'no.'" But the Senator did not do it. He swallowed it absolutely, preamble and all, and to-day is the first time that the waiting country ever knew that the Senator from Ohio did not believe in the preamble as much as he believed in the resolution.

Oh, it is so wrong for the Senator from Ohio, on whose words the country hangs, to have concealed from the public all these weeks that he did not believe those contracts were conceived in fraud and carried out in iniquity. He did not believe in the resolution for which he voted, and he did not believe that the hysteria that swept the Senate, which is asking for fair play, asking for justice, ought to be heeded. He read a letter from somebody, whose name I do not believe he gave to the Senate, commending his course. I will wager that the man said, "Don't tell on me, because nobody believes it when I say that the people are condemning the Senate for being honest and upholding the Attorney General for being a crook."

I am not going to discuss very much more the committee's action in the House in whitewashing Mr. Daugherty. There is not much to say about it. I am entirely familiar with the personnel of the committee. I do know what Mr. WOODRUFF, a gentleman that did more than the Senator from Ohio ever did in his life and got every vote in his district when he ran for Congress, said about it. Of course I was on the committee at one time, but I got off of it.

Oh, I know what Mr. WOODRUFF said. I consulted with him, as I did with other people. He said they would not hear KELLER; and I know, if the newspaper stories may be believed—and I do not see any reason why they may not be—it never was an investigation of Daugherty, but it was a browbeating process of destroying KELLER. Then the chairman wanted to put KELLER on trial because he would no longer submit to a heckling that no self-respecting white man would submit to.

However, this is one of the smoke screens about which the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] talked so much yesterday as being thrown up. I should like the distinguished Senator from Ohio, when he gets over his hysteria, to tell the Senate what this telegram means. It was sent by Bennett to McLean and is dated January 29, 1924:

Saw principal; delivered message. He says greatly appreciates and sends regards to you and Mrs. McLean.

Now listen to this:

There will be no rocking of boat and no resignation. He expects reaction from unwarranted political attack.

Who is the "principal"? Who knows whether there will be any resignations or not? Who knows there will be "no rocking of boat"? Without so much agitating the Senator from Ohio, who knows everything and modestly admits it, I should like for him to say who is the "principal." Who is it that knew that nobody was going to be put out of the Cabinet? Who knew that nobody was going to "rock the boat," and who was praying that this political agitation, this hysteria, would soon pass away?

I say, Mr. President, if it is hysteria which has swept the country, every honest man except the Senator from Ohio should thank God that hysteria swept the Senate one time, because if it had not been for the hysteria in the Senate there would have been no disclosure of the treason on the part of the former Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fall; for everybody knows that the Attorney General, if he had been in possession of the facts would not have done it, because he permitted his agent, Mr. Burns, to turn over to the friends of the accused the private code and inform them of every step that was being taken and instructed them to be very cautious. They sent a wire down there, "Do not even mention 'peaches' or 'apricots' or 'pears' in anybody's presence for fear somebody will know that you have got the code." That is what it means. "We have given you this code now, and don't go around talking, lest somebody should find out that you have it." They mention "ducks." I guess that was hysteria. They started talking about "ducks" and "peaches" and "pears" and "apples" and sending code messages.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Sentaor from Montana?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator know that the man who is referred to as Duckstein is the private and confidential secretary of Mr. McLean?

Mr. CARAWAY. No; I did not know that.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator know that Mrs. Duckstein was, up until about December, the confidential secretary for William J. Burns and is now an operative in the Department of Justice?

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the Senator from Montana is not trying to sweep me into hysteria. [Laughter.] Mr. Rochester is the private secretary and publicity agent for the Attorney General, is he not?

Mr. WHEELER. I think so.

Mr. CARAWAY. And he sends messages. Of course, that is entirely proper; we have never heard the Senator from Ohio object to that at all. There is no hysteria in the department protecting crooks. It is only hysteria when the people try to regain their property and to punish criminals. That is hysteria.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. Does the Senator from Arkansas in saying that "that is proper" mean that it is proper to "play ducks and drakes" with the Department of Justice?

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator knows it is worse than that, but that meets the approval of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], I am sure, because the Senator from West Virginia can not be unmindful that the Senate, including the Senator from West Virginia, has been lectured by the Senator from Ohio as being irresponsible and hysterical and a disgrace and a shame and infamous, and in the same breath, almost, he smiles and said, "I have known the Attorney General and he is a man of upright character and unimpeachable integrity."

Mr. WHEELER. And "as clean as a hound's tooth."

Mr. CARAWAY. It was the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] who characterized the Attorney General as being "as clean as a hound's tooth." The two Senators from Ohio are not hysterical. Oh, no; they are not subject to hysteria; but they certainly are agitated when there is any effort made to find out what is Mr. Daugherty's connection with this matter. I defy either one of them to point out a single act of his, or to call attention to a single word that he ever uttered that helped in any way to uncover the sale of public property or to forward in any manner the investigation to ascertain, first, to what extent the corruption extends, and, secondly, to punish the people who are guilty of the offense.

It is not hysteria when one takes that side of it; when one stands with Fall and McLean and the Attorney General and helps them, as the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] says, to "play ducks and drakes" with the people's rights. That is manifesting statesmanship; that is standing by the Constitution, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] suggests, having in mind, probably, the touching lecture which the Senator from Ohio gave us a moment ago about the Bill of Rights. If it were not for probably being suspected of being hysterical, I should like to move some time that the Senate have night schools and get the junior Senator from Ohio to read us a lecture on the Bill of Rights and the protection which ought to be thrown around crooked officials when they are found betraying their country. He would be a very apt teacher, I am sure.

Mr. STANLEY.. The fourth amendment to the Constitution is a part of the Bill of Rights.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes; but the Senator from Kentucky must not talk about the Constitution; he has not been constituted the guardian of the Constitution; he has not the proper viewpoint; he believes that crime is crime and that people who betray their country are guilty of wrongdoing; he is subject to hysteria; he must sit at the feet of the Senator from Ohio and learn to look with dispassion upon traitors and with approval upon the betrayal of public trust and spread the mantle of charity over every criminal, provided the criminal is from Ohio—and there will be a pretty large mantle needed. [Laughter.]

REPLYING TO SENATOR FESS OF OHIO.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the people of the country who are really interested in what some Senators are trying to do here to prevent corruption in Federal office in the future and to punish those now in office who are guilty of corrupt conduct will read with interest and approval the able and timely speech of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] scolds the Senate and lectures the Senate, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, and severely criticizes the Senate for what has been transpiring here for the last two or three months, as he puts it. I believe the Senator from Ohio referred to the proceedings as being disgraceful.

Mr. President, it is unpleasant to us to have to go into the very disgraceful conditions that have been uncovered among Republican officials high in authority. But somebody has got to do it. A grave responsibility rests upon every Senator in this body. The Department of Justice, the President admits, would not function properly, and so he employed two attorneys to represent the Government in the oil-scandal cases. The Senate of the United States, the Senator from Ohio included, authorized the selection of two attorneys outside of the Department of Justice to represent the Government. That act was a reflection upon Mr. Daugherty; that was a confession on the part of the Senate and the President that he was not the proper man to represent the Government in these cases. If the Department of Justice will not function and if the President feels that it is necessary to employ counsel outside to represent the Government and the Senate feels that way about it, the country is justified in asking, Why does the President continue to keep Mr. Daugherty at the head of the Department of Justice? What are we to do when officials accept bribes? What are we to do when they betray their trusts? Are we to sit here under such shameful conditions with folded hands and sealed lips and do nothing? Mr. President, if we did that the country would have good reason for saying the Senate itself is corrupt; but, thank God, there are Senators here who are foot-loose and free to fight to a finish the big, crooked interests and those that they corrupt in high office.

I know that it is disagreeable to the intensely partisan spirit of the Senator from Ohio to hear coming out day by day these astounding facts that involve the Republican administration. It is unpleasant and disagreeable to the Senator from Ohio to hear here day after day startling and astounding facts brought out that disclose scandal and corruption in the very citadel of the Republican Party. But ill does it become him in the face of the mighty facts already disclosed to undertake to lecture Senators who have the decency and the courage to fight crookedness and corruption wherever found.

The Senator from Ohio says that it is bad for the children of the country to read about the terrible things that are being discussed here. I confess that it is bad for them. Yes, indeed, unfortunate for them and all the people of the United States that conditions are so rotten as to make it necessary to discuss them. They are reading about it not because of any wrongdoing on the part of the Senators whose duty it is to discuss it but because of the crooked and corrupt conduct of unfit and unfaithful Republican officials. But for the disgraceful conduct of Denby and Fall, two members of the Republican Cabinet, and others connected with this national scandal, there would be no occasion for worry about what the youth of the country may read or not read concerning the debates that take place in this body. The Senator from Ohio need not think that the Senate will permit Republican officials to prove unfaithful and be corrupt in office and get away with it because, forsooth, the children of the country might read about the discovery and punishment of crooks in office. The way to keep wholesome newspaper articles before the eyes of the children of the country is to place men in office so clean and honest that they would not stoop to do an unclean and dishonest thing.

That is what we are striving for. That is why we are storming the ramparts of this administration. That is why we are pulling the curtains aside day by day and showing the awful, rotten condition that has been kept hid right in the strongholds of the Republican Party.

The Senator from Ohio speaks of certain Senators here who are being disgusted by the discussions that take place in this Chamber. Well, if there are those who are disgusted, I suggest that they resign. I think the country would be helped if some that I know should resign. I really do not think it would injuriously affect the country. The Senator who is disgusted because we are going into these unpleasant things and are trying to get at the truth for the good of the country, for the preservation of our free institutions, is not the right kind of Senator; I will say that to the Senator from Ohio. It might be well to spend a little time lecturing on that line—on respect for our oath of office and our duty to our country.

Why, of course, these discussions are not pleasant to the junior Senator from Ohio. The Senator is a very intense Republican partisan, and I know it must annoy and irritate him to see the Republican Party expiring in a lagoon of oil—to see these awful disclosures that permeate nearly every branch of the Government under Republican control. I know that it must pain him deeply, but he owes it to his country to help us to run down and punish every official crook in the country. I would not try to give Mr. Daugherty a clean bill of health before the committee is even selected to investigate him. I would let it be selected, and then let Mr. Daugherty go before it, and I want him to have a fair trial. The Senator objects to the proposed personnel of the committee. He would not have the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] on it and he would not have the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] on it.

I suppose he would like to have a little pink-tea performance staged or a little sewing circle arranged. We want to go after the facts in this thing. We want the truth brought out. We want somebody to make this investigation who has the courage and moral stamina to get at the truth and the whole truth. We want somebody to do it who has the ability and disposition to do it. We want somebody to do it whose hands can not in any way be tied by sinister influences from any source and who can not be made to tread softly when approaching facts that ought to come out but that will involve somebody else, either on the inside or outside, high in the councils of the Republican Party.

Why, certainly the Senator from Ohio is disgusted. He says we have become not a deliberative body but an inquisition. What are you going to do when your Department of Justice, established for the purpose of looking after the enforcement of law, looking after the apprehending and punishing of criminals, falls down; when the head of it himself is arraigned and charged with reprehensible conduct? What are you to do—wait for the department itself to function against itself?

If a policeman should hold you up and rob you and you should report him, and those in authority should refer you to the policeman and tell you to take it up with him, would you feel that you were going to have a fair deal? When the Department of Justice is charged with doing things that we are going to try to stop, if you write to the President and he refers the matter to the Department of Justice, you have to deal then with the very people you are charging with having done things that were wrong. In a situation like that, whose business is it to investigate? It is the business of this branch of the lawmaking body or the other branch, the people's House of Representatives.

Of course these discussions are unpleasant to the Senator from Ohio. They no doubt cause him to have bad dreams and also some other Republicans.

I criticized the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] yesterday for visiting Mr. Fall in his apartment with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] without telling the other members of the committee, and the effort was made here yesterday to show that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] had done everything he could to help bring out the facts, to go to the bottom of things in question, when the Senator from Wisconsin himself voted against permitting Senator WALSH to ask Sinclair certain questions in the development of the case. Here it is, right in the record before me.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] demanded that Sinclair answer these questions. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the chairman of the committee, opposed making him answer the questions. The roll was called. The Senator from Montana voted to make him answer. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], another member of the committee, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD], and one other, four against three, I believe, and he was compelled to answer. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] voted against making Sinclair answer.

I suppose the Senator from Ohio is disgusted when the chairman of the committee that is itself investigating this thing has these things brought out in debate in the Senate. It is very unpleasant, no doubt. As I said yesterday, we are having to do a lot of things that are unpleasant. Well, we have a duty to perform here, a duty to the country. Ought we to leave these things covered up? Ought we to let them stay in the committee room, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, and never bring them out until at some distant day a final report may be made?

No; that is not my idea as to the way it should be done, Mr. President. Let public opinion—enlightened public opinion—begin to get in its work, because, God knows, a house cleaning is needed in Washington. Crooks must be driven out; criminals must be apprehended and punished; the Government must be cleansed and preserved. It makes no difference what individual suffers for his crooked conduct, if each one of us when he goes from here can look back and say, with his hand on his heart and his eyes lifted toward the skyland and the stars, "I have been faithful; I have discharged my duty to my country."

Mr. President, that is the thing that a public man ought to strive to be able to say; but some people seem to think that if they can serve some big interest and by being their agents accumulate some of this world's goods and be accounted rich, that that is the goal to be sought. It is not mine. It is not that of many that I know in this body, I am glad to say.

That is not all, Mr. President. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on September 3, 1919, in a speech here said:

> I am very frank to say that I do not believe it is possible for the Government, irrespective of any questions which are pending here, ever to maintain naval reserve No. 2 as a naval reserve. If we get these claims, the only way to save the oil for the Government is to take it out of the ground from the wells that are now existing there.

That is entirely pleasing to Doheny. That is the position that he takes; and as far back as 1919 the Senator from Wisconsin held this view, and he is now the chairman of this investigating committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. That is reserve No. 2. Does the Senator know that every officer of the Navy agrees with that statement, and everybody else, so far as I know?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know that. I know that all the officers of the Navy except Robison were opposed to transferring the naval reserves and that Robison was the man picked out to pass on it—the very man who was friendly to what Denby wanted to do and what Fall wanted to do and what Doheny and Sinclair wanted to do. He, of all men, was picked out to do this thing. The whole Navy rose up in arms against the transfer of these oil reserves, but this man Robison was picked out, and they got his opinion, and his opinion was expressed after Doheny had called on him on his ship and had spent some time with him very pleasantly.

I do not know. The Senator says that the naval officers agree with this. I am reminding the Senate of his position on this oil proposition as far back as 1919.

I want to bring another thing to the attention of the Senate. It will probably be disgusting to the Senator from Ohio.

On another occasion the question was up whether Mr. McLean should come and testify. By the way, the Senator from Wisconsin on yesterday claimed that he had done everything he could to get him there; that he was under subpœna now, and all that. If my recollection serves me right, when the matter came up as to whether they would have him come or accept merely a written statement that he might write out and send in to the committee, the Senator from Wisconsin voted to let him write out and send in the statement.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator read the record upon that point? Will he not be accurate enough to say to the Senate that the question was whether Mr. McLean should be excused from coming for a period of at least two weeks, and then the committee would determine the question? If the Senator will read the record, he will see that the Senator from Wisconsin voted to take the sworn statement with the statement that when the committee received that statement it would then determine whether it would proceed further in requiring his personal presence.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will look up that statement to get it absolutely accurate, Mr. President. I remember the incident, and I was correct in the view that the Senator from Wisconsin favored taking the written statement at that time. He states that he coupled with it the statement that Mr. McLean was to appear later; but he has not appeared yet, and I am very anxious for him to appear.

Now, I want to bring another thing to the attention of the Senate. It may also be disgusting to the Senator from Ohio. That is that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made the statement to the committee over which he presides that he saw no necessity for Secretary Fall coming before the committee. Here was the man of all men who ought to have been interrogated. This is the man that the Senator from Wisconsin called on in his apartment with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]; and this is what occurred, the Senator from Wisconsin speaking:

> With reference to Secretary Fall, I want to make this statement: When this testimony came in about the purchase of the ranch I then indicated to Senator SMOOT, who was then chairman of the committee, that Mr. Fall should appear before the committee. My only point was that there should be a disclosure of the method by which the purchase was made. That disclosure having been made, I do not think of any reason why he should appear before the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will not the Senator read the rest of it?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is all of it I have here in the RECORD.

Mr. LENROOT. No; there is more there.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am reading from the speech of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will read the record he will find that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], immediately preceding that statement, made the statement that he did not desire to press it himself; and he will find that I, in the statement the Senator is now reading, stated that if the Senator from Montana did not care to press it, Mr. Fall having made the disclosure, I saw no reason for his appearing.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I differ with the Senator about that. Why should he not be summoned? He is charged with having transferred this property, worth billions of dollars, to Doheny and Sinclair. Of all men, it seems to me he ought to have been called and interrogated, and here was a move made to let him off and not call him in at all. I do not know whether this was before or after the visit to Fall's apartment.

I merely call these things to the attention of the Senate because of the statement of the Senator yesterday that he was doing everything he could to get at all the facts. I recall another statement, though I can not put my finger on it just now, where the junior Senator from Wisconsin stated that up to that time he had not suggested a single witness. I will get that statement, so that it will be absolutely accurate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. I call the Senator's attention to the remarks of the Senator from Montana made yesterday. He said:

> Mr. Fall went to El Paso. He was there when the witnesses from New Mexico told their story about the sudden rise in affluence of Mr. Fall and his expenditure of approximately $200,000, as it was traced to him, when he had not had money enough to pay his taxes for 10 years. Of course, that testimony was startling in its character, and the Senator from Wisconsin rightly recites that forthwith, in what seemed to me something like consternation, because both he and the Senator from Utah had up to that time exhibited the most implicit confidence in Mr. Fall, he said that this information should be given to Senator Fall at once, and he should be invited to come before the committee. I said in that connection that in my judgment he should be apprised at once of the information, but that he should be left to judge for himself whether he should come or not.

Mr. HEFLIN. Whose statement was that?

Mr. LENROOT. The statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator from Montana on that. I would have summoned him. Of all men, Fall himself should have been called then and questioned by this committee, and I can not understand how an investigation would be complete without examining the man himself who had accepted money, who had been paid for the thing he had done, permitted to roam around the country undisturbed, at large, not even calling him before the committee.

I am reminded that at the time the Newberry case was up we criticized some members of the investigating committee then for not even inviting him to appear before the committee. It was shown in the debate that they had not even asked him to come before the committee and make a statement. The protection of party ought never to be indulged in to the hurt and injury of the country. Why should such treatment be accorded these big rich fellows?

We would not do that for the ordinary man. He would be brought in; if necessary, a policeman would bring him in, and he would be seated there, and he would be interrogated, and in right severe fashion in many instances. But Mr. Fall is going away. I think he is now down on his ranch, which he has improved so much with the thousands and thousands of dollars he got out of this corrupt transaction.

One other thing, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Ohio. I want this whole thing to be made so odious that no public official in the future will ever dare do such a thing. I want fathers and mothers of the country to be able to say to their children, "Yes; these things have been going on, but it is right and proper to expose them and to tell the truth concerning them. They got some bad men in office. The situation is humiliating and shameful, and it is right to clean it up. The Senators are cleaning it up, and it will have a wholesome and far-reaching effect. It will help to get good men in office in the future and benefit the Government now by letting unfaithful officials know that their days are numbered." Of course, good is going to come from it.

But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] suggested in his effort at scolding the Senate this morning that it was all disgusting to him. Disgusting to bring out facts? What are we here for—just to sit around and let things go on, and say, "If we bring it to the attention of the public it might disturb some child who will read about it in the newspapers?"

No, Mr. President; let the children be taught from their childhood up that there are two kinds of people—one class honest and upright and fearless; another class crooked, corrupt, and cowardly—and just as sure as there are good and evil in the world, there are people whose conception of right and justice is one way and people who look and feel the contrary way.

When the latter, the bad ones, get into office you are bound to find out just who and what they are, because the Bible says truly:

> By their fruits ye shall know them.

Now we are going after this investigation. We are going to get at the facts, and I want to say that this committee does not have the final say. This committee will bring in its findings. It makes the investigation and it will report to the Senate. There may be a majority report and a minority report, and both reports will be discussed and thrashed out before and by the Senate itself.

The effort to give Mr. Daugherty a clean bill of health before the investigation is had, it seems to me, is a little premature. I think it would have been better for the Senator from Ohio to have made his remarks to the committee or after the committee reports its findings.

I want to submit this statement in that connection: Why is it that the President permits Mr. Daugherty to remain in office? Why does Mr. Daugherty want to remain in office? Are these his reasons? Does he want to stay in possession of all the correspondence until the hearing is finished? Does he want to remain Attorney General so that all the officers and agents under him would not want to testify against their chief? Oh, Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that those are the disgusting things.

Why does he not go to the White House and say to the President, "Mr. President, I want to relieve you and I want to be relieved. I want an investigation and I want to resign, with the understanding that if I am found innocent you will immediately reappoint me Attorney General. Why does he not do that? Why does he stay where he can keep his hand on all the correspondence? Why does he remain where the officers under him are intimidated and feel embarrassed to testify against their chief?

If he will not do that, why will not the President ask for his resignation, so that these various agents of the department may be free, and can stand up and testify as they would like to testify, and as I believe many of them will testify if they have the opportunity, free and unfettered.

This is the Government's business. It is not a political party matter. It should not be. This investigation ought to be made in the interest of right and justice and truth, and we ought to have in mind always in all of these things the good of the country. That is my position in it, Mr. President, and however unpleasant it may be to the Senator from Ohio, however disgusted he may become day by day and week by week, these facts are going to be given to the people. They are entitled to know the facts, for this is their Government; we are their servants, and when we, speaking for them, find a crooked and corrupt condition in the Government, it is our duty to discuss it here in the open Senate and let the country know just what is going on in their Government at Washington.

Why are you after this man Fall? He has betrayed his trust. Why are you talking thus about him? He has accepted a bribe. Why are you saying these things in the Senate? He has bartered the oil domain of the Nation, he has deprived the country of its naval oil reserves, he has squandered billions of dollars worth of property, and we are after him to expose him and to punish him if we can; to get back this property, and to let those who are tempted in the future to do wrong know the fate of Denby and Fall and Daugherty, if he be convicted. Men who forget their oath of office and turn their backs upon the principles of right and justice and become the subservient tools of crooked and corrupt interests ought to be exposed and excoriated, it makes no difference how shocking and how disgusting the disclosures may be to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. President, the truth should be known. The country knows what is going on here. The country knows under what difficulty some of us are laboring day by day to get the truth to the country. The country knows, from what has transpired, how the effort has been made to cover up and hide important facts. The country is entitled to know, and unless we stand up and fight, and expose evil doing that hurts the country, we ourselves are guilty of unfaithfulness to the American people.

Let it not be said of us that because of fear of somebody trying to connect us up with the Teapot Dome or with the Doheny oil interests we did not act. The fellow who is unable to talk on this subject and unable to condemn this thing may be suffering from color blindness caused by oil colors and oil paintings. If Mr. Daugherty is innocent, he ought to be acquitted. If he is guilty, he ought to be exposed and convicted and removed from office. We are told that two Republicans, Senator LODGE and Senator PEPPER, requested Mr. Daugherty to resign. If the President is convinced by what he knows and by what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] told him regarding Mr. Daugherty that something is radically wrong, why does he not ask Mr. Daugherty to get out and let a real and a very thorough investigation be had? Let him say to him if he chooses, "If you are found free of guilt and with clean hands, I will reappoint you as soon as the investigation is over." That is the way to get at the truth, if they really want to fight this thing to a finish in the interest of the people and the Government of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I would like to say that there may be a very wide difference of opinion concerning the last proposition laid down by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] in his speech. If I correctly understood him, he said that on this side of the Chamber, and very generally in the Chamber on this side, there had been a disposition to play politics, and if I correctly analyzed his statement the Senate was brought rather severely to task for engaging, as he classed it, in extraconstitutional activities, and particularly this side of the Chamber was so arraigned.

Mr. President, I do not believe it can be very justly said that Senators who have asserted themselves upon this side of the Chamber have done so from political motives only, or even chiefly. If there had been a disposition to play politics concerning the important revelations which have been made in the Senate for the two months past, the party on this side of the Chamber could have rested its case upon the able and searching and thorough presentation made by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and could have left upon the present administration full responsibility for action upon the strength of that statement made by him.

But the Senate did not play politics. Rather than leave upon the administration the full and unassisted responsibility there was introduced and passed a resolution to which the junior Senator from Ohio takes exception, particularly to the preamble of the resolution, calling upon the President of the United States and authorizing the President of the United States to employ counsel for the cancellation of the naval oil reserve leases and for the prosecution of offenders, if offenders should be indicated to the satisfaction of those counsel. I had occasion to say, and I say again, that every legislative body on the face of the earth in taking action upon any question has a perfect right to express the reason for its action. It is not binding nor is it intended to be binding upon any other department of government, but it is only a question of whether the legislative body has the information and has the will to make the declaration. If it sees fit to make the declaration it can not be classed as an extraconstitutional exercise of authority by anybody.

Not only did the Senator from Ohio inveigh against the preamble to that resolution but the Senate was taken rather severely to task for the Denby resolution. The Denby resolution may have brought before the Senate a debatable question. The distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] expressed himself upon that question, and in very clear and very forceful language. But I do not think that after the Senate has acted, the Senate is to be severely arraigned and criticized. I do not, and I am not willing to, admit that men of this side of the Chamber, at least, did not have some reason that seemed satisfactory to them even in the consideration of the Denby resolution. I know that I had, whether erroneously or not. Whether my reason was well founded or ill founded there appeared a reason upon which I was willing to vote.

I do not discuss the question of fact. It was too clear and palpable to all the world that Mr. Denby was a necessary party, at least a proper party, to the very suit that had been authorized by the Senate for the cancellation of the leases. As point of fact, he could not have remained in the Cabinet. In point of good conscience, he could not have remained in the Cabinet when his own acts were being solemnly challenged in the courts, and I do not refer to the facts upon which I acted and other Senators may have acted. I refer to the reason that seemed to me to justify the action, and seemed to me to remove it from the criticism directed against it by the junior Senator from Ohio.

I have never said and do not now say that the right of petition preserved in the first amendment to the Constitution was the authority upon which I acted. The right of petition was adverted to here, and by very able Senators. I recognize that the right of petition is the right of a citizen to petition his Government, and has absolutely no technical application to the right of one department of government to petition another department of government. But if those who framed the Constitution were careful to say that even the Congress should not take away from the people the right to peaceably assemble and to petition the Government for redress of grievance, it can hardly be imagined that they supposed that a coordinate department of government did not have the right of petition. Historically, the allusion may have some benefit, but technically it furnished no justification, in my judgment, for the vote that I cast on the Denby resolution.

Nor do I lay great store, Mr. President, by the assertion that the power to advise and consent to the appointment of Mr. Denby still continued or at least was not exhausted in the initial exercise thereof. Other Senators may have found justification for their vote in that, but in the Constitution I find an express grant of power to the Congress to preserve the national domain, a power expressly granted to the two Houses of Congress to protect the public property, including the naval oil reserves. When, in the exercise of an express grant of power, the legislative branch of the Government comes to the point where the subject committed to the Congress can not be adequately protected save by Executive action, I, so far as I am concerned, am willing to rest my vote requesting the executive department to act upon that express grant of power. Had the Congress gone over into the domain of the Executive power and had the Congress sought to exercise that power quite a different question would arise.

But since when has it become the doctrine in America that one coordinate department of Government under our Constitution, to which the Senator from Ohio adverts, shall not be on speaking terms with another coordinate department of that Government? Since when has the doctrine come into existence that the Congress, charged with the express power of protecting the public property of the Union, can not ask the Executive to exercise a power referred to and vested in him exclusively, if in the opinion of the Congress action by the executive department is necessary and is imperative?

So I say, Mr. President, that it seems to me the Senator from Ohio should not have subjected to criticism the Senate and those Senators present who voted not only for the Walsh substitute resolution with its preamble, who voted not only for the Denby resolution but who had what they believed to be a reasonable justification for that vote, and that the Senators who did so vote were not, as he said and very clearly indicated, exercising extraconstitutional powers and converting themselves into a court of inquisition, trespassing where they were not entitled to go.

It has occurred to me that many of us have confused the issues that have arisen in the last 60 days with the issues that ordinarily arise in public trials. A legislative body is not a court, but—and this seems to me to be the point that we have overlooked—the legislative body is to act and is to proceed on principle, and when a man's public reputation or public character is to suffer because of proper legislative action, it is but an incident, and it can not stay the legislative action.

It is not a trial now that is proposed, and there has been no trial proposed save the civil and criminal actions to be instituted and prosecuted by counsel employed under the resolution giving to the President the power to employ counsel. We are not to try the Attorney General. He is not to go upon trial. Shall we say the legislative branch of the Government shall stickle and halt and hesitate to act because a man's public reputation, his public character, may suffer because of that legislative action? Has not the Senate power to appoint a committee to investigate any department of the Government, any department supported by the Senate in part by appropriations made by the Congress? If the Senate has the right to investigate the department, is the Senate to hesitate, is the Senate to refuse to do its duty merely because the public character or the public reputation of some one who is investigated may be thereby smirched, to use the term that has been used so often in the debate?

To assert that we are to so hesitate is to lay it down as basic that we are to legislate not upon principle, that we are to act not upon principle, but that we are to proceed with a due regard for our personal feelings for men who occupy high and responsible official positions. The very suggestion is at bottom an insult to a man who thoroughly and fully appreciates his responsibility as a member of a legislative body.

Now, Mr. President, it has been asserted here by the junior Senator from Ohio that 60 days have been wasted, have been spent purely in an effort to play politics, to assassinate the character of men, purely in an effort unworthy of the Senate; and if he is to be allowed to define that effort, if he is to be permitted to define the reason and motive and purpose of the Senate, and of individual Senators, then, of course, it is an exhibition wholly unworthy of the Senate. But I desire to say for myself that I have felt justified in supporting the Walsh substitute with its preamble; I have felt justified in supporting the Denby resolution; and I do not discuss the question of fact involved. I have felt justified and feel justified in supporting the resolution now before the Senate for the Senate to elect a committee to investigate the Attorney General.

I feel justified in doing so, Mr. President, upon the ground which I have tried to make plain; that is, that the investigation shall proceed, not as a criminal hearing or trial but as a proper legislative act, and shall proceed strictly and solely upon principle and without regard to and with no purpose to inflict any unauthorized or any unjustifiable injury upon the public reputation of the man who happens to hold the high office of Attorney General. Concerning that man, I shall say nothing; concerning any of his acts or official failures to act, I shall say nothing; concerning anything that may have been done or omitted to be done by the Department of Justice, I shall say nothing. It is sufficient for me to know that there are grounds upon which I may justly base my vote for the resolution; and I am willing to leave it to the agent created by the Senate to proceed with the investigation fearlessly upon principle, not for the purpose of trying but for the purpose of ascertaining facts which the Senate is entitled to have within its possession in order that it may properly function as a legislative body.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I was wondering if we could not agree upon an hour to vote upon the pending resolution this afternoon. A number of Senators on this side of the Chamber—and I think on the other side—have engagements this afternoon which they would like to meet. So, if we could get an agreement to vote I wish we might do so. I suggest that we vote at half past 3 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with the suggestion just made by the Senator from Kansas. The debate has had a very wide range during the last two days, and we should dispose of the resolution this afternoon if it be possible to do so. There are, however, one or two Senators who have stated that if a proposal to fix a time to vote upon the resolution were made they desired that the absence of a quorum be suggested in order that they might be present while the arrangement is under consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before any agreement shall be made I should like to ask if the form of the resolution as it now obtains is to be the form upon which we are going to vote? The preamble will require some attention if we are going to vote upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in reply to the question of the Senator from Idaho I desire to say that I myself see no objection to striking out the preamble. It raises issues of fact that are not necessarily pertinent to the provisions of the resolution, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall make no objection if the author of the resolution consents to such an arrangement, to striking out the preamble.

Mr. WHEELER rose.

Mr. BORAH. Let me say to the Senator from Montana, who has risen, that the objection I have to the preamble is that it states facts, and I am not sufficiently informed to know whether they are facts or not to enable me to vote upon them.

Mr. WHEELER. To which clause of the preamble does the Senator from Idaho refer?

Mr. BORAH. There are several of them. In the first place the preamble refers to reports of the Federal Trade Commission and the failure of the Attorney General to act upon them. It states as a fact that such reports were made; that so many cases were reported to him, and he did not proceed. I do not know about that. I do not see that it will help the committee which shall investigate the matter to retain any of the preambles in the resolution. The second preamble is similar, and the last preamble reads:

> Whereas no action has been taken by the Department of Justice in prosecuting to a conclusion the so-called war fraud cases.

I am informed that some of those cases have been adjusted and settled, but I do not know what the facts are. However, as I see the matter, it will not help us to retain the preamble in the resolution. If the preamble strengthened the Senator's resolution, I should feel differently about it, but I do not perceive that it does so.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Idaho that after conferring with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who, I assumed, was looking after the interests of the Attorney General, I agreed to strike out two clauses of the preamble, and the Senator from Ohio stated that the remainder of the preamble was satisfactory to him. Consequently I have not any particular objection to the preamble being stricken out, except that I will say to the Senator from Idaho that two reports have been sent in by the Department of Justice since the resolution was offered; and yet I have the positive evidence in my pocket, furnished to me by attorneys who work in the Department of Justice, that there are numerous cases which have not been prosecuted by the Attorney General and numerous other cases which have been dismissed after they were started.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is altogether probable that the Senator from Montana when he drew the resolution was in possession of facts which warranted him in drawing it as he has drawn it, but I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts to vote them as facts. The Senator will be able, if he is on the committee, or any other Senator who is interested in the matter or who is on the committee will be able to present such matters without the preamble quite as efficiently and effectively as if the preamble were retained in the resolution. I do not care to debate the matter at length, although I do want to be placed in a position where it is understood that I am not passing upon a question of fact. I am willing to vote, and am rather anxious to vote, for the investigation, but I myself do not want to pass upon a question of fact.

Mr. MOSES. In the whereas, at the top of page 2 of the resolution, there is found a reference to disclosures in the investigation of the Veterans' Bureau, which apparently has no place in the resolution, for it appears from the press reports this morning that indictments were found on yesterday.

Mr. BORAH. There may be others that ought to be found. However, it is not that proposition that I have especially in mind, but that I am called upon as a Senator to vote on something which is set forth as a fact which I do not know to be a fact, although I presume the Senator from Montana is himself in possession of the information.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, my opinion is that the preamble of the resolution has no controlling force; that it will not in anywise help to uncover the facts to which the investigation will be directed, and, frankly, I think if a preamble of the character of that contained in the resolution is to be adopted it should be revised very materially. There are other circumstances and transactions and failures to act upon the part of the Department of Justice and its head not referred to in the preamble of the resolution which, according to evidence brought to my attention in a form which I believe to be authentic, could certainly, with as much propriety, constitute a part of the preamble. The point I am making is that the preamble is no part of the resolution; that it is weaker than the resolution; and that nothing detrimental to any interest involved in the investigation could result if the preamble was stricken out entirely. Of course, in the first instance, that is the question to be determined by the author of the resolution. I should like now to proceed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas, and also the attention of the Senator from Montana, to the language of the resolution proper on page 3, from line 7 to 13:

> And said committee is further directed to inquire into, investigate, and report to the Senate the activities of the said Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and any of his assistants in the Department of Justice, which would in any manner tend to impair their efficiency or influence as representatives of the Government of the United States.

Under that provision all the various subjects matter could be inquired into.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; and that is the reason I say that the preamble is narrower and weaker than the resolution itself. The resolution is all-comprehensive, and very properly so.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to the preamble being stricken out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well, then; we will assume that the preamble will be stricken out.

Before the agreement is entered into——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield for that purpose, but I should like to resume the floor afterwards.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Ernst	King	Robinson
Ashurst	Ferris	Ladd	Sheppard
Ball	Fess	La Follette	Shortridge
Bayard	Fletcher	Lenroot	Simmons
Borah	Frazier	Lodge	Smith
Brandegee	Gerry	McKellar	Smoot
Brookhart	Gooding	McKinley	Stanfield
Broussard	Hale	McLean	Stanley
Bursum	Harris	McNary	Stephens
Cameron	Harrison	Mayfield	Swanson
Caraway	Heflin	Moses	Trammell
Couzens	Howell	Neely	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Norbeck	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Johnson, Minn.	Norris	Warren
Dale	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Watson
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Weller
Dill	Kendrick	Ralston	Wheeler
Edge	Keyes	Ransdell	Willis

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. CAPPER] is unavoidably absent. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] is necessarily absent for the day. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] also is necessarily detained from the Chamber. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that all debate close, and that we vote on the resolution and all pending amendments and amendments to be offered at 3.30 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may amendments still be offered?

Mr. CURTIS. I said that—amendments to be offered.

Mr. DILL. And what about the limitation on speaking on those amendments?

Mr. CURTIS. I think we ought to close all debate. I do not think any material amendments will be offered. I will state to the Senator that I had intended to offer three or four amendments myself; but I have talked with the Senator who has charge of the resolution, and I think we will agree upon those amendments, and he will amend his resolution.

Mr. DILL. I will say to the Senator that I want to offer an amendment, and I want at least five minutes to talk on it.

Mr. CURTIS. I am perfectly willing.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator can offer that amendment now, if he will, and take the floor. If he has the amendment ready, he may present it now.

Mr. DILL. I can present it later, when I can talk on it. I would rather do it at that time, but I do not want to be shut out of an opportunity to offer the amendment and speak five minues on it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, after the resolution is adopted will we proceed immediately to the election of the committee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest that the Senator from Kansas incorporate that in his agreement.

Mr. CURTIS. I will.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I want to reserve the right to object to that part of it. The unfinished business here is the farm-relief measure. I gave notice in the Senate three days ago that I wanted to speak 20 minutes on Thursday or Friday. I have not yet had an opportunity to speak, and I should like very much to address the Senate for a few minutes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; then we will have to go ahead and take the regular course, if the Senator objects.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is that, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There was objection, as I understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There was objection to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. CURTIS. There was objection—objection to the last part.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is objected to entirely, and request has been made that it take the regular course.

Mr. KING. I call for the regular order.

Mr. NORBECK. I do not object to bringing the matter to a vote at 3.30, but I object to proceeding to vote immediately afterwards on the election of the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. Nothing is to be accomplished unless we can dispose of the whole matter, by merely passing the resolution. I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, during the debate many subjects remotely if at all related to the subject matter of the resolution under consideration have been discussed, and in some instances the discussions have been characterized by intense feeling on the part of those participating.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] yesterday and this morning criticized a reference made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to proceedings in another body. It is, of course, desirable that in so far as practicable allusions to debates and actions in the body at the other end of the Capitol be omitted; but, Mr. President, at the time of that proceeding, and for all the period that has elapsed since, there have been many who felt that there was a failure for one cause or another, fully to develop the facts and circumstances which might justly have been brought out in that proceeding; and my understanding of the reference which the Senator from Nebraska made to it was that he primarily intended to show that unless there is upon the special committee some one who has a knowledge of the circumstances and facts to be developed, and who has a purpose and intention to see that they are presented, there will likely result failure of disclosures that ought to be made.

The Senator from Nebraska contended, and I think fairly, that this is not a trial; that the resolution does not contemplate a trial in any fair test of that term within the meaning of American jurisprudence. This is an investigation; and the whole power, the countless agents of the Department of Justice, are directed against the effective consummation of the purpose of this resolution. Instead of having the assistance and cooperation of the Attorney General and of the agents who are employed under him, the committee will find itself, so long as the Attorney General remains in office, opposed at every turn and in every effort that it may make.

I do not say this in censure of the Attorney General nor in criticism of the skilled investigators who are employed in his department. I say it because it is natural and true. Every Senator knows that the instant it became known that this resolution is to pass, the great investigating organization of the Government of the United States, whose business and duty it is to expose fraud and corruption, has been directed toward the prevention of the disclosures contemplated by the resolution.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] may criticize the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and other Senators when he chooses. That is the privilege of a Member of this body, so long as he does not transcend the rules of the body; and I think the Senator from Ohio did not violate the rules. The Senator from Nebraska, however, has enjoyed a long and honorable service in the Congress of the United States. I knew him when he was a Member of the House of Representatives, and I have known him, as most of you have known him, throughout his career as a United States Senator. I make the declaration that for courage, sincerity of conviction, intellectual honesty, and honesty in every sense in which the term may be applied to individual and to official conduct the Senator from Nebraska stands preeminent among the public men of America.

The Senator from Ohio saw fit to arraign the majority in the Senate. His language was severe to a point approaching bitterness. He declared, on page 61 of the stenographic notes of his remarks, that the Senate is not a deliberative body if judged by its record of the last two months; that it is an inquisition and has become a sluiceway for the transmission of suspicion.

Mr. President, it is doubtful if in the history of this body there has ever before been an occasion and an issue which have aroused such interest among the people generally and such feeling among the Members of the Senate as have been produced by the disclosures made through the activities of the Public Lands Committee in connection with the naval oil-reserve leases. The Senator from Ohio sees in these disclosures nothing to occasion alarm, nothing to arouse excitement, nothing to invite or provoke criticism. From reading and re-reading the language of his address I reached the conclusion, as I think anyone else who heard it concluded, that there is in his mind a grave doubt as to whether anything has transpired that has been disclosed that justifies resentment in the breasts of honest citizens. He doubts whether the Government is right and will prevail in its suits to recover the properties bartered away through the faithless betrayal of trust by members of the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

He thinks, after reading all the evidence and hearing all the discussions, that the Government probably will lose the suits, and, judging from his remarks, he is not conscious of any act on the part of either the Secretary of the Navy or Secretary Fall or of the Attorney General which justifies the censure which the people of this country have heaped upon those officers and which has been reflected in the debates in the Senate.

I shall not make an effort now to convince the Senator from Ohio that when the Secretary of the Navy signed the leases to the Government oil lands—in violation of law, in disregard of law, and against the public interest and the well-established policy of the Government, as the Senator himself voted the action of the Secretary of the Navy to be—I shall not consume time in trying to convince him that such conduct on the part of Cabinet officers forfeits their right to the confidence of the public, and to remain in the offices whose prerogatives they have so grossly abused.

The Senator from Ohio thinks that the Senate committed an offense against the Constitution of the United States, violated every propriety which should govern, when it adopted the resolution asking the President to call for the resignation of Secretary of the Navy Denby, and he finds great pleasure in that the President declared that he would not act upon the recommendation or request contained in the resolution. Yet Senators, and everyone who reads the press of the country, know that if the Senate had not passed the resolution Secretary Denby would be in office to-day, just as the Attorney General is in office, in spite of the fact that the President has plainly indicated he would like to have that officer resign.

The Senator from Ohio characterizes the passage of the Denby resolution as a political act. He might well remember that, notwithstanding the officer whose cause he has so valiantly and recklessly challenged has not been heard by the Senate or any committee of the Senate, Members on his side of the Chamber who are influential, and not insignificant in their power, have asked the President to dismiss the Attorney General from the high office which he holds.

We read how the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], after having characterized a public resolution of the Senate calling for the resignation of Secretary Denby as "lynch law," went to the White House and attempted privately to accomplish what the resolution sought to do publicly. We read, too, how the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] went to the White House and demanded that the President discharge Mr. Daugherty, notwithstanding the fact that while Secretary Denby had been heard three times Mr. Daugherty had never been called to appear before any committee.

On yesterday that amiable but somewhat dictatorial Senator, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], issued a pronunciamento, in which he explained that before Mr. Daugherty could be gotten out of the Cabinet it would be necessary for Republicans to bring more pressure. I read from a report contained in the New York World:

Senator WATSON called on the President and later expressed the opinion it would take more pressure from the Republicans to force Daugherty out at this time. He said there were three eventualities which would bring a resignation, and those, as recounted to him after the Attorney General had seen the President, were:

1. If President Coolidge requests the resignation.

Everyone knows that the President has the power to choose his own advisers, his own Cabinet members, and that the instant a condition arises that makes a Cabinet member useless to him, or the instant his usefulness has become impaired, the President has the power to put him out of the Cabinet and select some one with whom he can advise.

It is perfectly apparent, then, that the President has not requested the resignation of the Attorney General. Every Senator knows that if he does do so the Attorney General will be compelled to comply with his request.

The second condition, says the Senator from Indiana in his remarkable analysis of this situation, is that—

2. In case the investigation proposed by the Senate might establish something about him of which he himself is not now aware, in such fashion as to besmirch his reputation and force him to resign.

3. In case the investigation should prove him absolutely guiltless of any wrongdoing, so that he could retire honorably and not by the back door.

So that while the Senator from Ohio is arraigning the Senate of the United States for having abandoned or discarded the characteristics that should mark its procedure and for having become a sluiceway for suspicion against innocent men, the leaders of his own party, who manifestly have not found it either necessary or profitable to advise with the junior Senator from Ohio, have been putting on pressure in every possible form to get the Attorney General out of the Cabinet, to "lynch" Attorney General Daugherty. It was "lynch law" for the Senate to ask the President, in a formal resolution, to call for Secretary Denby's resignation, but it is an act of virtue for prominent Republican Senators in order, I take it, to save their party from the effects which inevitably will result if the Attorney General remains in office—it is a virtuous act for them privately to try to induce the President to put him out of office.

The mystery of all this proceeding is disclosed by a statement emanating from the White House and published this morning in the Washington Post. It says:

PRESIDENT TO ORDER INVESTIGATION INTO LEASE GRANTED STANDARD OIL.

While the Senate was debating on the resolution to investigate the Department of Justice, President Coolidge yesterday authorized the announcement that he would name within a few days another special counsel to conduct an investigation into the rights of the Standard Oil Co. to section 36 in naval oil reserve No. 1, in California, concerning which there is great controversy and which has been described as the key to the whole oil leasing scandal.

Listen to this:

Investigation of this phase of the matter is expected to involve Attorney General Daugherty directly with the oil scandal and with the operations of former Secretary of Interior Fall. The Government had instituted a contest against the Standard Oil Co. claims to section 36. They were held by responsible Government officials who had charge of the case to be valueless, but the Standard Oil Co., in a proceeding which has been characterized as "unprecedented," took the case directly before Fall, who dismissed the contest "out of hand" without hearing the Government side of the case. This action was taken despite a recommendation to the Attorney General by his subordinates that the Government press the contest.

In several administration quarters it was stated yesterday that the President by instituting this special inquiry may force the Attorney General into a position where he must resign sooner than he now expects to retire from the Cabinet.

Diabolical beyond the power of language to describe! It is "lynch law" for Senators in open session to say to the President, "A committee of this body has found a state of facts which disclose that the Secretary of the Navy has violated the law, has acted without authority of law, has acted in disregard of the public interest and the well-settled policy of the country, and therefore we respectfully request that you substitute some one for him who will obey the law." It is "lynch law" to make a formal declaration of that character, but it is virtuous conduct to go in the back door of the White House secretly, without giving Mr. Daugherty a chance to defend himself, and urge the President to put him out of the Cabinet.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. That statement from the White House would indicate that the President himself has joined those "hysterical" Senators whom the junior Senator from Ohio inveighed against this morning, would it not?

Mr. ROBINSON. Clearly it is an indication that the President is attempting to force the resignation of the Attorney General without asking him to tender his resignation.

It is incomprehensible to me, in view of those facts, how the Senator from Ohio, in any stretch of the remarkable imagination which must characterize the mentality of any Senator who can make a speech like the one he uttered on this floor this morning, can find that this is a political persecution inaugurated and carried on by Democrats.

The Senator from Ohio has joined with the chairman of the Republican National Committee in an effort to give to the proceedings of the Senate a character which will discredit them. We occasionally say things here in the heat of debate which we do not mean. Sometimes we become perfervid and utter sentiments which afterwards we wish we had not uttered.

While I do not profess skill in prophecy, I think that in the years to come when the junior Senator from Ohio looks back upon the proceedings of the Senate which he has characterized so harshly, which he has criticized and condemned so bitterly, and then reads again, if he is not forever hereafter ashamed to read his own utterances, the strange words, the incomprehensible sentences that composed the greater portion of his speech to-day, he will wish that he had never given vent to utterances which in their legitimate construction stamps approval upon transactions which constitute dishonorable and corrupt conduct upon the part of officers of the United States when they bartered away in secret hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of public property.

Mr. President, the opinion of the junior Senator from Ohio to the contrary notwithstanding, the people of this country do not regard and will not regard the passage of the Denby resolution as an act of usurpation on the part of the Senate of the United States. They will never be able to comprehend how a trained statesman, experienced as is the junior Senator from Ohio, could put his approval upon transactions which everyone else than himself regard as having discredited the administration of which the Senator from Ohio assumes to be a champion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Inasmuch as the two Senators from Ohio, as I recall, are the only Senators who have risen in their places on the other side of the Chamber to defend Mr. Daugherty, is it not a matter of not the greatest importance in the world as to their views?

Mr. ROBINSON. O, Mr. President, the resolution will pass unanimously, except possibly for the votes in opposition of the two Senators from Ohio. The Denby resolution passed by an overwhelming vote, and the Wheeler resolution, characterizing the acts of Denby and Fall as violative of law and against the public interest and well-settled policies of the Government, passed unanimously both Houses of Congress. And yet the junior Senator from Ohio characterizes the preamble to that resolution and characterizes the Denby resolution as a demonstration of hysteria.

It is not remarkable that the Senate should have displayed intensity of feeling. The most remarkable thing that has occurred is the performance to-day of the junior Senator from Ohio. I do not blame him for defending Mr. Daugherty. He is his friend; and, God knows, Mr. Daugherty has few friends left. I honor the junior Senator from Ohio if he believes the statements that he makes, and I know that he must believe them or he would not make them. If he believes in the honor and the integrity of the Attorney General, I honor him for standing by the side of his colleague and defending Mr. Daugherty to the last ditch. But when he stands isolated in this body—when he stands alone and takes a position by himself—propriety and sound sense, if he demonstrates either, ought to prompt him not to be unduly censorious against the overwhelming majority that stands in opposition to him.

I sympathize with Mr. Daugherty. He came into the Cabinet as the supreme political boss in the affairs of the Nation. Men who wanted to go upon the bench, men who desired positions in the Government service, not only in the department of which the Attorney General became the head but in the other departments as well, had to procure the O. K. of the great political patronage distributer, the Attorney General of the United States. And now for a year or more his prestige and power have been declining. For more than a year charges have been made which affect the integrity of his administration. Charges have been made which involve questions as to his efficiency. And now, with the Senate passing a resolution to investigate his conduct and his administration, he stands with his back to the wall fighting alone, except that the chairman of the Republican National Committee, Mr. Adams, says that it is all politics, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] seems to agree with him.

Mr. President, I want fair treatment for the Attorney General. I want just consideration of his acts. But, sir, the interests of the people of the United States can not be submerged, can not be disregarded, can not be subordinated to considerations of sympathy or politics. While the investigation is on let it be thorough and complete. Let every rogue in office, whether Democrat or Republican, be brought to account. Let the Senate move with majesty and determination, in the face of puny and petulant criticism, to the performance of its duties. Such considerations overshadow, as stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], mere considerations of personal interest and friendship. Deep down beneath the multifarious transactions pertaining to Government procedure in the recent past the committee must delve to find and make known the facts. If the result should prove that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and the President have done Mr. Daugherty an injustice by bringing every possible pressure to bear upon him to resign when he does not want to resign, if the facts justify the vindication of the Attorney General, no one will be more highly gratified than I.

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION BILL.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, this bill may fairly be considered as two separate measures. When introduced it covered only one feature—relief for the farmers in the wheat area. It provided for a $50,000,000 fund to be loaned in small amounts to worthy farmers for the purchase of livestock as an important step in the necessary diversification. This is the feature on which the committee held hearings for several weeks.

Just before the bill was reported out of committee an amendment was offered and adopted providing for an additional $25,000,000 to be loaned in sections outside of the wheat district in need of relief. This feature is applicable to every one of the 48 States in the Union and the Territory of Alaska, though it is not anticipated that there will be any great demand from that far away and much neglected part of this Union.

You will note that it is not intended to be an agricultural relief measure in any broad sense. It is, as the title expresses it, an emergency relief for a very limited area—the wheat belt—for those farmers who were not permitted to sell their products in a free and open market during the war.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. The bill, as I understand it, is limited to the wheat area, which is not described geographically. We would assume from that that it would pertain and apply more particularly to the large wheat-growing sections of Minnesota and North Dakota. Is that the Senator's idea?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes; more particularly in the way that they are the larger wheat-producing area, but it is not limited to that section.

Mr. KENDRICK. It is not limited to that section?

Mr. NORBECK. No.

Mr. KENDRICK. It will apply to surrounding States—South Dakota, Wyoming, Montana, and States of that kind——

Mr. NORBECK. That is the understanding.

Mr. KENDRICK. In the same proportion where the same conditions prevail and the same need for relief is felt?

Mr. NORBECK. Exactly.

Mr. KENDRICK. I thank the Senator, for he is unusually well informed as to conditions in my State and knows that wheat growers of Wyoming have been punished as severely as those of any place in the country and will therefore be entitled to every provision of relief that can be extended to them.

Mr. NORBECK. The Government did not only fix the price of wheat, but it fixed it 50 or 60 cents per bushel below the prevailing market and held it down to the same level when every other commodity was permitted to soar. Wheat farmers have a special claim upon the Government, because the widespread disaster that now exists in that region was due primarily to governmental action:

First. By lowering the price and holding it down.

Second. By appealing to the wheat farmer to win the war by a greater production of wheat.

Third. By inaugurating an effective system to reduce the domestic consumption of wheat.

It is always an open question how much the farmers lost by the Government interference with the wheat market. The price was reduced by the Government approximately 50 cents a bushel. Upon that basis they can prove a loss of nearly $2,000,000,000. But had their products been permitted to find their own price levels in a free and open market, as other commodities, the farmers would have received some six or eight billion dollars more for their wheat.

No class in the whole country responded more readily to the appeal of our Government than did the wheat farmer. He understood his farming conditions well; he needed no tutor. He was not only aware of the benefits of diversification, but he realized its absolute necessity. He had already substantially reduced his wheat area and materially increased his livestock holdings in the years preceding the war, as will be shown in the table on page 139 of the hearings. But the Government said "more wheat"—so he sold his hogs, he sold his cattle, he sold his sheep. He invested the money in plows, harrows, binders, tractors, and trucks. His compliance with the Government suggestion was 100 per cent.

Neither did the farmer complain of the fact that an effective propaganda was inaugurated to reduce the domestic consumption of wheat.

The Government succeeded in weaning our people away from wheat. Had it not been for the increased acreage and the decreased consumption, due directly to governmental orders, we would not now be exporting a surplus product. The farmer would have been selling all his products in a protected market, for he would be supplying the domestic market only. He would be selling his wheat at a profit instead of at a loss. At the present time he is selling his exportable surplus in the world market in competition with cheap labor and cheap land, and this feature has largely regulated the price in the domestic market.

You would think from this, Mr. President, that the Government had done plenty to the wheat farmer and that they would not have thought of doing any more to him. But truth is stranger than fiction. The facts are that while the Government acted as the beneficent agent of the farmer in the handling of his grain they proceeded to take out of him a profit of somewhere between fifty and eighty million dollars.

It would be a fair statement to say that the Government holds in trust to-day more than $50,000,000 of money that belongs to the farmers, taken from them by the Grain Corporation.

I well realize that a technical denial can be made of this fact, but any lawyer or layman would admit that the denial was technical and not fair, nor even true.

It seems that on at least two different occasions our Congress took pity on underfed and starving people of Europe. Under an act approved March 30, 1920, a credit for food supplies to the amount of nearly $57,000,000 was given to Armenia, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland, for which the Government received the bonds of these countries. But the food furnished was from the stores of the Government Grain Corporation and no reimbursement was made to the farmers.

Under an act approved December 22, 1921, a $20,000,000 fund was provided for Russia. The common impression is this was taken out of the United States Treasury, but it was taken from a fund that the Government held in trust for the farmers.

These facts are set out fully in a recent communication from the Treasury Department.

This country has prided itself on its liberal attitude to Europe, and it is difficult to understand why this relief burden should be borne by the wheat farmers instead of by the country as a whole.

This measure is commonly known as the "Coulter plan," named after Doctor Coulter, president of the North Dakota Agricultural College. It was the outgrowth of several conferences held in the northern wheat district, to see what measure of relief might be worked out for the wheat farmers. The people of South Dakota took no part in these conferences, but are in hearty accord with this purpose. South Dakota is no longer a one-crop State. We raise 5 bushels of corn for every 1 of wheat. Diversification started 40 years ago in the southern part of my State, but the northern part has continued up to the present time to be a heavy producer of wheat. This is the section that participated in a small way in the seed-grain loan of last year, but I am proud to report that 86 per cent of that loan has already been repaid to the Government and the remainder is in process of collection.

Even under normal conditions the credit situation of the western country is different than other sections. There is a scarcity of local capital. The country is new and its accumulation of cash is small. The large industries that have made so many wealthy people in other sections and created such a surplus of funds as to provide available credit are unknown in the Northwest. The rich man does not live among us. When we buy a wagon, a harrow, or a sled we send our money East. When we buy shoes, or clothing, or groceries, the money goes East. When we pay for a life-insurance policy or a fire-insurance policy the money goes East.

The Northwest farmer from the very beginning of the settlement of the country has fully realized that he needs two kinds of credit. He can generally secure the long-time or farm-mortgage money from the East through life insurance companies or farm mortgage bankers. In the 50 years of its settlement there has always been a scarcity of short-time money, except for a short period of inflation following the close of the war. Never has there been such a shortage as in the last three years; the deflation period. Ordinarily small loans would be available at the local banks for putting in the crops or the harvesting of same, or for the payment of taxes or other current expenses until the crop could be marketed. Eastern or outside capital has never been available for these purposes and is not now.

We have for a half century been suffering from a scarcity of funds and high interest rates. The farmer's hopes ran high a year and a half ago, when it was announced that the Federal Government at Washington would soon inaugurate an intermediate credit system that would make funds available for the farmer's ordinary needs. But the most promising thing about the proposition was that we were assured that it would tend to reduce interest rates. I shall not here deal on the disappointments of the failure to secure the promised legislation.

The purpose of this bill is not to have the Government reimburse the farmer for his loss. It does not even aim at securing a better market for him in the future. It is an emergency measure to reach a small percentage of farmers who must diversify in order to survive.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NORBECK. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. I should like to ask the Senator if there is not a widespread appeal from the Northwest for this proposed legislation, and does not that appeal come from men in every line of business and every industry as well as from the agricultural or farming community?

Mr. NORBECK. Yes. The Senator from Wyoming is entirely correct. I will speak of that later. There is universal demand for this proposed legislation from many of the Northwestern States. That demand comes from Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and other States.

There are over 20,000 farmers in North Dakota alone who do not produce their own milk and butter. They are without livestock. They have not the funds with which to purchase. There is no credit available to them. They have inquired at the Federal reserve bank and have been told that they are not eligible as customers. They have received the same answer from the War Finance Corporation. They have gone to the intermediate credit and have turned back without hope, the first requirement being that the loan must be made through a local bank.

The widespread disaster has ruined or crippled about 95 per cent of the banks in the northern wheat district. There is not one bank in twenty that is able to take on an additional burden. The farmer can look to no one, except to the Government—that ruined him—to give him a small chance once more. The farmers ask through this measure that the Government lend them a few hundred dollars each with which to purchase some cows, pigs, or other livestock. They have the land; they have the buildings; most of them have the experience. They are men of long residence and good standing in their communities. They are worthy and well qualified.

The bill provides that the maximum loan shall not exceed $1,000, but it is believed that the average loan will be less than half of this.

In the long, thorough investigations conducted by the Agricultural Committee of the Senate much accurate and valuable information was secured. Among witnesses who appeared were practical farmers from the Northwest, officials of farm organizations, persons connected with the agricultural colleges, State officials having special charge of agricultural work, and many bankers and business men who spoke with an intimate knowledge of the situation.

Under the direction of the North Dakota Agricultural College, a careful survey was made of the needs of a typical section of this wheat district. I desire to quote from the testimony given by Mr. Willard, farm economist of the college referred to. I ask that the testimony of Doctor Willard may be inserted in the RECORD without reading. It deals at length and in detail with the situation. They took a survey of a large part of the county; they took a number of farmers and figured out the per cent of those who had buildings and those who had lands, how many cattle they could handle, what their credit facilities were, what their chance of success was, and what their attitude toward a measure of this kind was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from South Dakota will be granted.

The testimony referred to is as follows:

I wish to turn now for just a few minutes to a short discussion of a survey that we made near the central part of State for the very purpose of determining the necessity and the applicability of this $1,000 loan proposition as embodied in the proposed legislation. We took a corps of 12 men, who are trained men, who understand how to get this sort of information, to this region and we completely covered three townships and half of a fourth, taking every farmer without regard to who he was, and got a set of detailed information from him as to his cropping system, his amount of stock, the various classes, his net worth; that is, his assets of all sorts and liabilities, consisting of first, second, and third mortgages, his chattels, personal notes, back taxes, interest past due, etc. We verified those liabilities with the financial representative of those farmers and found that they had given in general a very true report, and some of the information contained in that survey I will touch upon, and you may find in these sheets the detailed information, which you can consider at your leisure. That region is representative of probably more than two-thirds of the State of North Dakota, and also is applicable to parts of Montana and South Dakota.

The average size of farms in this region was 575 acres, and 217 acres was in wheat, and this comprised 47 per cent of the crop area of those farms. The average yield of wheat for five years was slightly over 8 bushels on these farms and for this year 5.6 bushels, being about 40 per cent less this year than for the five-year average.

Of all the crops produced, corn, which occupied about 11 per cent of the crop area, maintained its average five-year yield of approximately 24 bushels to the acre. There is some variation between owners and tenants. There were 61 owners and 45 tenants covered. The number of livestock varies between them somewhat, but in general the relationship holds for both classes.

There were 21 farms out of the total 106 farms that had no brood sows whatever; there were 48 out of 106 that had 2 or less; out of 106 farms there were 13 who did raise some sheep and 88 per cent raised no sheep at all. There were 14 farms that had less than 50 head of poultry, and there were 54 farms, or more than 50 per cent, that had less than 100 poultry, which is about the lowest economic unit for our conditions.

There were 50 farms that had less than five milch cows, and those milch cows were only milch cows of a sort, because they were of the short-horn breed that are usually recognized as of the beef type, and these they were endeavoring to milk.

On this average farm the total income for dairy sales amounted to $234 per farm, that meaning a cash income of only $39 per cow. For all classes of cattle, both beef and dairy, the combined income reduced the average income per cow to $23.

Now, in spite of that low income, under present conditions it was a better proposition than wheat, as I will point out just a minute later. Now, these farms show from the quality of the livestock quite definitely how this loan can be used to big advantage, and we determined the number of farmers who desire to make use of this loan for these purposes also. There were 31 farms out of 106 that had scrub sires for cattle. There were 30 farms that had pure-bred sires. The remainder in between had a rather low quality grade cattle.

Now, the outstanding things that these farms require is to improve the quality by disposing of the scrub stuff and substituting therefor pure-bred sires and in some cases better quality of grade stuff.

Records and experiments carried on in actual farms in surrounding territory and across the line in Canada indicate that in two years, with such a substitution in the quality of the stock, an increase in the income, without additional cost, of 50 per cent can be made in two or three years.

In the case of hog production we find the same sort of situation, practically. Twenty per cent of the farms have no sows at all, and there are 10 per cent more that had scrub sires, and there the same sort of introduction should be made.

At the present time and for a number of years sheep have been the most economical class of livestock that we have in North Dakota, as determined from detail records we have maintained on many farms where sheep have been handled. A very large number of the 88 per cent who have no sheep should immediately arrange for a sufficient number of sheep to begin on this enterprise as quickly as possible, and if the governmental policy with respect to the tariff on wool is maintained there is little prospect of overdoing the wool business for many, many years to come.

Now, the total average sales from these farms, being 575 acres in size, amounted to only $968, and that means a turnover of only 3.3 per cent on the investment.

Of 61 owners, 52 reported that they had barns and other buildings; and I might say that this section was visited by a terrific storm during the last year which almost completely demolished a few farmsteads, which accounts for the fact that not all owners of farms are now equipped with buildings, because it is rather the exception that they do not have barns for their work stock at least which are capable of housing some more additional livestock. Twenty-one out of 61 owner farms reported tractors and 47 reported automobiles. Fifty-eight out of 61 owner farms reported a considerable mileage of fence and 58 reported considerable quantities of feed and seed on hand for future use.

Now, in regard to obligations, 55 out of 61 owners reported first mortgages, and the average first mortgage amounted to $6,700 per farm; 19 reported second mortgages, and 3 reported third mortgages; 32 owners and 32 tenants out of 106 farms reported chattel mortgages; 101 farms had some sort of liabilities; only 5 farms out of the 106 had no obligations.

Now, the average amount of assets of owner farms was $29,419, and the average amount of liabilities was $11,317, and the average amount of net worth was $18,102 for owners. For tenants the average amount of net worth was $1,507, their average assets being $3,426. The relation of liabilities to assets seems to be of some significance and we find that of the owners 38 per cent of their assets was covered by liabilities, and in the case of the tenants 56 per cent was so covered. Of the owner farms 8 per cent had liabilities in excess of their assets, 37 per cent of the owners have more than half of their assets covered by liabilities, and of the tenants 13 per cent have liabilities in excess of their assets and 41 per cent have more than half of their assets covered by obligations. Under these conditions about 40 per cent do not have collateral of any sort with which to secure loans for livestock or any other purpose, even if money were available for their use.

In order to determine the attitude of the farmers toward the loan a series of question were asked. For example, we found that 34 out of 58 owners said they wanted to get this loan. They also said that they would be willing to make a report every 60 days on the condition of the livestock, and all but 1 of them said that he would be willing to accept the advice of a Government or agricultural college representative, if it were practical, in the handling of such livestock. Twenty-eight of the 34 who answered yes said that they had or could provide shelter for the livestock, and 33 said they had a sufficient water supply; 29 said that they had or could provide ample pasture.

The relative number of tenants that need the loan was greater than the relative number of owners, but the answers to these various questions as to shelter, the taking of advice, etc., was in about the same relative proportion.

Twenty-five farmers out of those desiring the loan wanted to replace the poor quality of stock, 32 out of 64 wanted to add to the stock they now have, and 7 wanted to start anew. This relationship, of course, is expected because of the livestock that they now have.

In the case of owners of small farms 60 per cent of their assets are covered by liabilities. The intermediate-size farms, between 320 and 640 acres, about 41 per cent are covered by liabilities. In the case of the large farms 28 per cent are covered by liabilities, and the average for all owners is 38 per cent.

Now, the relation of the livestock business to net worth has an important bearing in determining whether we want to urge livestock or not, so we made as careful a study as we could from this material and corroborated it from other information that we have from many parts of the State, and we find for these owner farms that have no livestock or very little livestock their net worth was $41 per acre, whereas those who had considerable livestock and made more sales the net worth per acre is $46, and we made an arbitrary division right in the middle, the lower half and the upper half, and their net worth was $46 an acre of land owned, or a difference of $5 in favor of the livestock farmer. That meant a difference in the net worth per farm on an equal-sized basis of approximately $4,000 in favor of the livestock fellow over the fellow who had little or no livestock.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the question has been raised whether diversification will result in overproduction in other lines. The production of dairy products has not kept pace with the consumption.

I quote further from the testimony of Mr. Willard:

In 1919, for example, we had a balance of trade in exports of dairy products; that is to say, that we exported more than we were importing by 2,645,000,000 pounds. But from 1919 down to the present time we have gradually reduced our exports until in the year just passed, according to the estimates furnished me by the Department of Agriculture, based on the commerce reports as far as they are available, we actually imported in 1923, 500,000,000 pounds of dairy products. That is the net balance.

From the standpoint of the national welfare we are now importing dairy products where a few years ago we were exporting large quantities. We are importing large quantities of wool. Our balance of trade in poultry products is slightly on the export side.

Mr. President, in closing I wish to repeat what I said in the beginning, that this is not a measure of general farm relief. The enactment of this bill into law will not bring the farmer's dollar back to par. He will still be unable to exchange a day's labor with anybody. This measure simply provides for limited credit to the farmers in the wheat region that have been nearly shipwrecked by Government interference with economic law.

This measure does not provide that the $6,000,000,000 that the wheat farmer lost by the Government refusing him a free and open market when every other industry was accorded one shall be paid back to him.

Nor does it even provide that he shall be reimbursed for the $2,000,000,000 that was lost on account of the Government lowering the price of wheat from its actual market to a lower fixed price.

It does not even provide that the $50,000,000 to $80,000,000 abstracted from the farmers by the Government Grain Corporation in the way of profits in dealing with his grain shall go back to the farmer's pockets.

Mr. President, this bill simply provides that the money taken away from the farmers in the form of profit by the Government Grain Corporation shall be loaned to them for a short time at 6 per cent interest.

Mr. President, I ask that a communication addressed to me by the Treasury Department may be published in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The communication referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 29, 1924.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your telephone inquiry of to-day with respect to the profits of the United States Grain Corporation, the Treasury does not have all the details of the matter, and you could probably obtain more complete data, if desired, by addressing Mr. Edward M. Flesh, president and treasurer United States Grain Corporation, 42 Broadway, New York City, but I hope that the following will serve your purpose:

The Treasury's information is that substantially all of the profits of the grain corporation, and in fact some of its capital, have been used up in providing relief under two special acts of Congress, for part of which foreign obligations were received in payment. In this connection I am inclosing herewith a copy of the act approved March 30, 1920, authorizing the corporation to sell or dispose of flour then in its possession, not to exceed 5,000,000 barrels, for cash or credit and at such prices and on such terms and conditions as might be necessary to carry out the purposes of the act for relief of the populations in countries of Europe or countries contiguous thereto suffering for want of food. For this flour the grain corporation received foreign obligations aggregating $56,858,802.49, face amount, a list of which is shown on the reverse side of the statement of the public debt for November 30, 1923. (Copy inclosed.)

I am inclosing also a copy of the act approved December 22, 1921, authorizing the expenditure from the funds of the United States Grain Corporation of a sum not exceeding $20,000,000, or so much thereof as should be necessary, to purchase in the United States and transport and distribute corn, seed grain, and preserved milk for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia and for spring planting in areas where seed grains have been exhausted. I understand that the expenditures made by the corporation under authorization of this act practicaly exhausted its remaining cash assets.

The $500,000,000 capital stock of the corporation, all of which was owned by the United States Government, has been reduced by repayments to the Treasury of $475,000,000, and the Treasury understands from the corporation that the remaining $25,000,000 of capital stock has since been retired in the course of liquidation, so that the corporation now has no stock outstanding. It is, in fact, in course of dissolution under the Delaware law, its charter having expired on August 16, 1922, and has practically no assets remaining.

You may also be interested in the President's Executive order of August 21, 1920, which provided in part as follows:

> "The United States Grain Corporation (a governmental agency organized and conducted pursuant to Executive orders and proclamations of the President under said acts of Congress) shall pay and cover, or cause to be paid and covered, into the Treasury of the United States, as miscellaneous receipts, all amounts refunded by certain licensees of the United States Food Administration (a governmental agency organized and conducted pursuant to Executive orders and proclamations of the President, under said act of Congress approved August 10, 1917), in voluntary divestment of profits taken by said licensees during the 10 months which ended June 30, 1918, in excess of the maximum allowable profits fixed and determined under and pursuant to said act of Congress approved August 10, 1917, and the proclamations, Executive orders, and regulations thereunder. * * *."

Under this order the United States Grain Corporation deposited in the Treasury cash to the amount of $7,078,988.55, which was covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

From the above it will be apparent that in connection with the retirement of its $500,000,000 capital stock subscribed for by the Government, the corporation has repaid to the Treasury $475,000,000, and for the remaining $25,000,000 has delivered $56,858,802.49 face amount obligations of foreign countries, whose economic conditions are such as to negative any expectation of early payment.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. PETER NORBECK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

COLOMBIAN STEAMSHIP CO.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not wish to delay a vote on the pending resolution; I am perfectly willing that a vote should be taken; I merely wish to occupy a moment or two while others may be getting ready to discuss the resolution, before the vote on it, to have inserted in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the Colombian Steamship Co. of New York.

On the 13th day of February I submitted some observations on the general subject of the shipping situation. In those remarks on page 2372 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I made reference to the Colombian Steamship Co. It appears that as to one particular matter, which I stated had come to me on information, my statement was somewhat erroneous. I asked the Colombian Steamship Co. to submit the facts to me, which they have done in this letter, and I ask to have the letter inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

COLOMBIAN STEAMSHIP CO. (INC.),
New York, February 19, 1924.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have been interested in reading your speech in the Senate on the shipping situation as recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 13, although you probably know that I do not agree; in fact, am opposed to the principle of Government operation, which your remarks from time to time lead me to believe you favor if I correctly interpret them.

I know that you do not wish to make an incorrect statement against any American line, and especially a comparatively new company that is seeking to develop at its own expense business in American ships from American ports to foreign countries. In the next to the last paragraph of the first column on page 2372 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 13, after commenting as to the number of ships in operation under the direction of the Shipping Board owned by the Government, you state that some of these contracts require examination, and illustrate the Colombian Line, New York to Windward Islands, as purchasing three ships from the Shipping Board and later being allocated four vessels by the Shipping Board. You are not correctly informed.

The facts are that the Colombian Steamship Co. was organized in April, 1923, with a capital of $500,000, subscribed to by a few American citizens of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Georgia, and Florida for the purpose of operating, primarily, to Colombia, but with calls at some West Indian ports. This company purchased five steamers from the Shipping Board, which were placed in the route with one other steamer owned by an affiliated company. The Shipping Board had up to this time been operating through agents three services covered by nine ships to the various foreign ports in the Caribbean and to the north coast of South America. The Shipping Board ships are now covering the Virgin Islands, Trinidad, British, French, and Dutch Guiana with two steamers, and have one vessel engaged in the Haitian outport trade. To all of their ports they have no privately owned American competitive sailings. Our joint services with the Shipping Board cover 28 ports under five foreign flags to which there has never been an established private American flag service. The Colombian privately owned service to the Windward Islands since the purchase of the ships from the Government has operated at a loss.

The only compensation that the Colombian line has received from the Shipping Board for operating all of its three vessels is that provided under the M. O. 4 agreement. The overhead expenses to which you refer are borne entirely by the Colombian Steamship Co. The Shipping Board in no way contributes to this expense, either directly or indirectly.

The Colombian Steamship Co. (Inc.) is the first privately owned American steamship company to buy in its entirety a Shipping Board service established under the merchant marine act of 1920.

Very truly yours,

COLOMBIAN STEAMSHIP CO. (INC.),
H. H. RAYMOND, President.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to refer to one other matter. On July 29, 1921, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4791, Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, I submitted some observations on the subject of the discrimination in ocean freight rates against South Atlantic ports and Gulf ports and in favor of North Atlantic ports. I understand the situation which I described at that time still continues. There has been some suggestion recently looking to a possible increase in trans-Atlantic Ocean freight rates, and I want to submit that before such increase goes into effect there should be a readjustment of the rates now discriminatory against the Gulf ports and South Atlantic ports and in favor of North Atlantic ports, extending all the way from Norfolk to Galveston, such discrimination including Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Brunswick, Fernandina, Jacksonville, Key West, Tampa, Pensacola, Mobile, and New Orleans. Those rates should be readjusted and those discriminations should be done away with. The present system is based on old-established rates. Prior to the time when we had adequate shipping under our flag and were dependent upon foreign lines to carry our products overseas the foreign lines put those rates into effect. They allowed differentials against the South Atlantic and Gulf ports which have been in effect for many years and are still continued. I submit that if there is to be any increase of trans-Atlantic Ocean rates there should be a readjustment respecting these old rates, and there should be an observance of the constitutional provision which protects the ports of this country, and which is to the effect that no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

I have before me an extract from the Traffic World on this subject, and a communication from Mr. R. L. McKellar, of Louisville, Ky., which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. And upon the subject of the proposed increase of ocean rates, particularly as applied to agricultural products, I desire to have inserted in the RECORD also and referred to the Committee on Commerce a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, dated February 29.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OPPOSES SOUTHERN RATE CHANGES.

Officials of steamship lines operating from New York to Europe are protesting to the Shipping Board against the movement started by R. L. McKellar, foreign freight traffic manager of the Southern Railway Co., to obtain export rates by Government vessels from south Atlantic ports equal to the New York rates. Local shipping men declare that the present rail-and-water rates are not unfair to the southern ports, considering the length of railroad and ocean hauls, and that the McKellar proposal would, in effect, be a distinct advantage to those points.

The normal movement to Europe from Chicago is through New York, which is the most direct route, and a differential in favor of Jacksonville is not only uneconomic but unjustified by any other reason, according to New York officials.

Mr. McKellar's illustration of the movement of agricultural implements from Chicago to French ports has been analyzed on the basis of present and proposed rates. The railroad rate from Chicago to New York is 47.5 cents per 100 pounds, or $10.64 a ton. The rail rate to Jacksonville is 41.5 cents per 100 pounds, or $9.30 a ton. The ocean rate from New York to French ports, on the basis of one weight ton equaling two measurement tons, is $10, while the Jacksonville rate is $11.60. The rail-and-water rate by way of New York is $20.64 a ton, compared with $20.90 a ton by Jacksonville, which is a longer route. If the steamship rates were equalized, as suggested by Mr. McKellar, the combined rate per ton by New York would be $20.64 against $19.30 by Jacksonville, a differential in favor of the latter port of $1.34 a ton. If points lower down the Mississippi and Missouri River territories are taken, the advantage in favor of Jacksonville would be correspondingly greater.

In the opinion of local shipping men this would be a discrimination against New York without any economic justification. (Taken from the Traffic World, February 2, 1924, p. 295.)

OCEAN RATES FROM ATLANTIC AND GULF PORTS TO EUROPEAN AND MEDITERRANEAN PORTS.

The parity adjustment of ocean rates that is being demanded by southern ports is needed to couple up with the approximate parity of inland rates from competitive territory, thus providing an adjustment of through rates and routes to foreign ports that will enable our foreign commerce originating in midwest and northwest territory to flow freely and without discrimination through all Atlantic and Gulf ports offering suitable steamship service. A wider distribution of our foreign commerce through Atlantic and Gulf ports is also economically desirable from the fact that the preponderance of traffic movement from the midwest is eastbound and from southern territory it is northbound, which means that the empty-car movement in eastern and middle western territory is westbound and in southern territory it is southbound; therefore, an additional loaded movement southbound, which export business will supply, will bring about a more equitable disposition of available cars and reduce the empty-car movement.

EXISTING DIFFERENTIALS FAVORABLE TO NORTH ATLANTIC PORTS.

Ocean rates from North Atlantic, South Atlantic, and Gulf ports to Cuba and other West Indian ports, South America, Central America, the Orient, through the Panama Canal, and even to Mexican ports, are the same from the three groups, notwithstanding the great disparity in distance in favor of the Gulf and South Atlantic as compared with the North Atlantic to the majority of these foreign ports. On the other hand, ocean rates from Gulf and South Atlantic to United Kingdom and continental ports are higher than from North Atlantic ports, the differential from Gulf ports, except on a few parity commodities, being 15 cents per 100 pounds, and from South Atlantic ports, except on a few parity commodities, the differential is 7½ cents per 100 pounds higher than from North Atlantic ports. In brief, where distance is in favor of New York, as representative of the North Atlantic group, rates are lower than from southern ports, but where distance is in favor of southern ports rates are the same from New York as from the lesser distant southern ports. The measure of ocean rates is not at all in issue. It is the relationship between port groups.

Some few examples of existing distance in mileage and ocean rates as between North Atlantic, South Atlantic, and Gulf ports are as follows:

1. Distance from New York to Liverpool, 3,107 miles. From Charleston to Liverpool, 3,540 miles. New York, less than Charleston, 433 miles, or 12.2 per cent. Rates from Charleston to Liverpool are 7½ cents per hundred pounds higher than from New York, except on coal, iron and steel, tobacco, and a few other parity commodities, which are the same as from New York. Cotton, which is a southern commodity, is 12½ cents per hundred pounds higher from Charleston than from New York.

2. From New York to Gibraltar, 3,207 miles. From Charleston to Gibraltar, 3,619 miles. New York, less than Charleston, 412 miles, or 13 per cent. Rates from Charleston to Mediterranean ports reached through Gibraltar are 7½ cents per hundred pounds higher than from New York, except on a few parity commodities.

3. From New York to Habana, 1,186 miles. From Jacksonville to Habana, 528 miles. Jacksonville, less than New York, 658 miles, or 55.5 per cent. Rates from New York to Habana are the same as from Jacksonville and other South Atlantic ports.

4. From New York to Habana, 1,186 miles. From Mobile to Habana, 553 miles. Mobile, less than New York, 633 miles, or 53.4 per cent. Rates from New York and Mobile to Habana are the same.

5. From New York to Colon, 1,974 miles. From Mobile to Colon, 1,371 miles. Mobile, less than New York, 603 miles, or 30.5 per cent. Rates from New York and Mobile to the west coast of South America, Orient, Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, and India, reached through the Panama Canal, are the same.

6. From New York to Liverpool, 3,107 miles. From New Orleans to Liverpool, 4,613 miles. New York, less than New Orleans, 1,506 miles, or 32.7 per cent. Rates from New Orleans to Liverpool are 15 cents per hundred pounds higher than from New York, except on tobacco, iron and steel, and a few other parity commodities, which are the same. Cotton, a southern commodity, is 20 cents per hundred pounds higher than from New York.

7. From New York to Gibraltar, 3,207 miles. From New Orleans to Gibraltar, 4,593 miles. New York less than New Orleans, 1,386 miles, or 30 per cent. Rates from New Orleans to Mediterranean ports reached through Gibraltar are 15 cents per hundred pounds higher than from New York, except on a few parity commodities, which are the same.

8. From New York to Vera Cruz, 2,017 miles. From New Orleans to Vera Cruz, 780 miles. New Orleans less than New York, 1,228 miles, or 60.9 per cent. Rates from New York and New Orleans to Vera Cruz are the same. From New Orleans to Tampico is 711 miles, or 65 per cent, less than from New York.

There are some other parity exceptions not mentioned, but in the main the general adjustment is as outlined.

The examples of discrimination given can be multiplied without limit, but these are sufficient to be fully illustrative.

There is a fringe of territory extending all around from Halifax to Galveston for 400 to 500 miles into the interior hinterland, from which territory rail rates to the seaboard are carried lowest to the nearest group of ports, as, for example, from territory on and east of the Buffalo-Pittsburgh line rail rates are lower to North Atlantic ports than to other competing ports, and from territory east of the Alleghenies, including West Virginia, they are lowest to Virginia and South Atlantic ports; and from territory south of the Ohio River, embracing the Southeast and Mississippi Valley territory, they are lowest to South Atlantic and Gulf ports; and from Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Texas they are lowest to Gulf ports. From this hinterland territory it is entirly proper that both rail and ocean rates be so adjusted as to insure movement through nearby port, but from competitive mid-west territory, including the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and other States north of the Missouri River, the rail rates to Gulf and South Atlantic ports for export are, with few exceptions, the same or no higher than to New York. This mid-west territory is highly productive of measurement cargo, which is so essential to profitable steamship operation; therefore, if there is a parity of ocean rates from Gulf, South and North Atlantic ports, it will allow export commodities originating in this large and productive territory to move to foreign ports on an approximate parity of through rates all the way around the circle from Halifax to New Orleans, with the exception of slight differentials in inland rates that exist in favor of Norfolk, Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Canadian ports under New York.

However, the approximate parity of inland rate adjustment from this competitive mid-west territory outlined is nullified so far as European movement is concerned, unless there is a parity adjustment of ocean rates on commodities originating in that territory.

It is appreciated that the differential ocean adjustment so manifestly discriminatory against South Atlantic and Gulf ports is of several years standing, and that any readjustment will be stubbornly resisted by competing interests. It is a fact, however, that this adjustment was established by foreign steamship lines whose interests largely center at New York, and before this country had a merchant marine of its own and prior to the publication by rail lines of export rates from the Middle West to South Atlantic and Gulf ports the same as to New York.

As a general proposition, ocean rates in the reverse direction on import traffic from Europe to United States ports are practically the same as to North Atlantic, South Atlantic, and Gulf ports.

PROPOSED DIFFERENTIALS IN FAVOR OF SOUTHERN PORTS.

Gulf and South Atlantic ports, and interior exporters using those ports, have for some time been contending for differential ocean rates under eastern ports to Cuba and other Gulf and Caribbean ports, based on the shorter mileage as compared with North Atlantic. The percentage difference in distance in favor of Gulf and South Atlantic ports to Cuba and other Gulf and Caribbean ports is much greater than is the percentage difference in favor of New York to United Kingdom and continental ports; therefore, if the same ocean rates from both groups are justified in the one instance they should also be justified from both groups in the other. It is a well-known fact to steamship men that in actual practice ocean rates are not varied in direct ratio to the distance freight is transported; that distance is most often disregarded and that cost of service is only one factor in determining ocean rates, which are rarely, if ever, made as the result of a scientific process of calculation. If, however, it is decided that the present trans-Atlantic differentials, or any differential, from South Atlantic and Gulf ports higher than North Atlantic ports is justified, either by competition or greater steaming distance—and that differential should therefore be continued—then in all fairness South Atlantic and Gulf ports are entitled to like differentials under North Atlantic ports to Cuba and other Gulf and Caribbean ports based on the lesser mileage from southern ports, and it devolves upon the United States Shipping Board, as a neutral body charged by law with the responsibility of maintaining trade routes from all groups of ports, to remove this unjust discrimination against southern ports, either by wiping out the trans-Atlantic differentials or establishing relative differentials under the North Atlantic from southern ports to Gulf and Caribbean ports.

This is a proposition that not only vitally interests the ports involved, but also all interior exporters desiring the benefit of additional trade routes in marketing their products in foreign countries, and what is needed from the ocean carriers is to place South Atlantic and Gulf ports upon a competing rate basis to the same extent that has been done by the rail carriers.

Eastern steamship interests are unduly alarmed over the proposed readjustment from southern ports. In the first place, all of the leading North Atlantic steamship lines have resident representation in all the principal interior markets, and this representation, added to all other advantages enjoyed by the port of New York, is sufficient to insure the continued supremacy of that port in foreign commerce.

Some of the leading advantages enjoyed by the port of New York are as follows:

1. The influence that cargo in volume has upon the establishment and maintenance of adequate steamship service, it being axiomatic that volume begets volume.

2. Frequency and regularity of sailings; superior and faster service—freight and passenger and joint passenger and cargo.

3. The wide range of foreign ports served by regular steamship service.

4. Superior banking facilities for financing exports and imports.

5. The shorter ocean distance to Europe than from southern ports.

6. The saving in interest charges by using the shorter and faster voyages from New York, as compared with the longer and slower voyages from southern ports.

7. The location of headquarters for all the leading steamship lines, including those serving outports.

8. The location of export and import commission houses.

9. The location of commercial representatives of foreign countries engaged in export and import trade.

10. The location of export and import offices of shippers, carriers (both rail and ocean), and foreign buyers, thus affording a meeting place for all of these foreign trade interests.

11. The volume of exports produced locally in the New York metropolitan district.

12. The volume of exports moving locally into New York for storage, rehandling, and sale by local export commission houses.

13. The volume of mixed car movement of less-than-carload commodities on basis of carload rates.

14. The volume of imports consumed locally in the New York metropolitan district.

15. Advantageous marine insurance rates and facilities.

16. The availability of ocean rates on distress room.

17. The strength of east-and-west lines in controlling export freight for their long haul from highly productive territory.

18. The use of long established trade routes and port arrangements incident thereto which, as a whole, makes the route through New York the line of least resistance.

These cumulative advantages render discriminating ocean differentials in favor of New York entirely unnecessary; in fact, these advantages outweigh any small differential against New York as evidenced by existing rail differentials in favor of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Montreal, and they also overbalance substantially higher port charges, both in the handling of freight and in the docking of vessels, as compared with southern ports, where ordinarily no charge is assessed for docking vessels.

R. L. MCKELLAR.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY,
Washington.

In reply to a letter addressed to him by Mr. Alfred G. Smith, president American Steamship Owners' Association, and made public in the press of February 27, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace released yesterday his answer to Mr. Smith as follows:

FEBRUARY 29, 1924.

DEAR MR. SMITH: I have your letter of February 25 with regard to the advance of 10 cents per hundred pounds on ocean shipments of packing-house commodities.

You say, "In the first place the advance is entirely justified, and, in the second place, as the commodities affected are principally manufactured packing-house products the prices received by the farmers can not in any way be affected.

From the standpoint of the shippers the advance can not be justified, and when I speak of the shipper of meat products I am thinking not of the packer but of the farmers and of stockmen who produce the livestock from which the meat is processed. Your suggestion that advance on packing-house products can not in any way affect the farmer is not well considered. The packer is in a position to take his manufacturing margin whether prices of livestock are high or low. His operating expense, including freight which must be paid, is included in the margin he takes and must be passed on. Transportation and packing charges are a part of the farmers' cost of production. Our meat products are competing in the European market with meat products from other countries. High freight rates and shipping rates handicap us in meeting that competition, and it is conceivable that these rates might be advanced to a point which would drive us entirely out of the market and leave us burdened with a domestic surplus which would be ruinous to our producers. Hog prices are even now below cost of production.

There is another angle to this matter which I wish you would consider. Your proposed increase in the shipping rate, while seemingly not large, is nevertheless substantial. If as a result of this increased cost of getting our livestock to market (for meat must be considered in terms of livestock) our foreign market is narrowed, shipping lines will suffer because of decreased shipments. It is quite possible that the decrease in the amount of freight moved might be much more than enough through reduction in total revenue from this kind of traffic to more than offset any possible gain from an advance in the rates.

I think a study of the relative prices of American meat products before the war and at the present time and of shipping rates before the war and at the present time will show that shipping rates have advanced out of proportion to the price of products. I am told that in November last the rate on meat products was advanced from 35 to 40 cents.

I am told further that, while this proposed increase does not affect wheat or other grains, there has been a steady upward trend in freight rates on wheat and flour since last September.

Permit me to make clear my position by saying that at the present time American farmers can not stand any advance whatsoever in any freight rates on any agricultural products on land or sea. American agriculture has been undergoing a depression, the like of which we have not seen before in all our history. Prices which the farmers get for their products are altogether out of line with prices which they pay for what they buy. They can not afford to pay one penny more in the way of freight rates. Indeed, they can not afford to pay the rates now in force.

Our shipping lines can render a great service to agriculture in its depressed state if they will make substantial reductions in rates on grains and meat products and do everything they possibly can to help farmers enlarge the foreign market for their surplus. I am convinced that such a policy would not only be of great benefit to the farmers but would be decidedly helpful to our shipping lines as well.

The condition of agriculture is such that all who transport, process, and handle farm products ought to reduce their charges to the minimum, and do everything possible to aid in its rehabilitation.

Very sincerely,

HENRY C. WALLACE.

REDUCTION OF TAXES—ADJUSTED COMPENSATION OF WORLD WAR VETERANS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have received quite a number of letters in which apparently there was a determined purpose to establish the theory that the reduction of taxes necessarily would eliminate the soldier bonus. I do not think that is true at all. I think the reduction of taxes can be carried out quite consistently with the granting of the soldier bonus. Under the proposal made by Mr. Mellon the reduction of taxes will be $300,000,000, of which $102,000,000 on surtaxes would increase the revenues by increasing the volume of business, so as practically to recoup that.

On the basis of the amortization system established by the farm loan act first as a principle in this country, if applied to the soldier bonus, and applied in precisely the same way that it was applied in the payment of the loan to the British Empire by the United States, it would require only $55,000,000 per annum to liquidate in 50 years the principal and interest of a billion dollars, or the total charge would be one and a half times $55,000,000 per annum on a 50-year amortization plan. I requested Dr. Clarence Owens to have these figures worked out by an actuary, and I wish to submit for the RECORD and have referred to the Committee on Finance his letter in response to that request, together with the figures, so that they may be seen by Senators in the RECORD. It will be observed that the charge of $55,000,000, plus the half of that amount, would be a little over $75,000,000 per annum by which the soldier bonus could be liquidated, estimating it at a billion and a half.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter and figures will be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE SOUTHERN COMMERCIAL CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1924.

Senator ROBERT L. OWEN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: I have the honor to submit to you a plan employing the principle of amortization under which it would be possible to secure the funds with which to pay the cash under the soldier bonus bill.

The Southern Commercial Congress organized the American Commission that, under an act of the Congress of the United States, cooperated with the United States Commission on Rural Credits, appointed by the President of the United States. I had the honor to serve as a member of the commission appointed by President Woodrow Wilson March 14, 1913. The heart of the Federal farm loan act, passed by the Congress of the United States, based upon the report of these commissions, employs the principle of amortization, and under the law $1,200,000,000 have been loaned to American farmers. The principle is therefore understood by the farmers throughout the United States, as every rural district in the country has been the recipient of the benefits of the law. Herewith you will find a digest of the reports of the commissions above referred to and also a copy of Senate bill 500 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, containing the Federal farm loan act. See page 29 of this document for the chronology of this legislation.

The Southern Commercial Congress during 1922 and 1923 organized and directed the International Trade Commission throughout Europe and submitted a plan for the settlement of the debts of nations, including German reparations, by the employment of the principle of amortization. The Southern Commercial Congress initiated this plan that was adopted in the settlement with Great Britain and Finland. The plan has been submitted to the debt-funding missions of all interested countries. Great Britain is now funding a debt of $4,600,000,000 on this principle. The principle has been approved by the British Parliament and by the Congress of the United States. In approving it the Congress of the United States set aside a law previously adopted providing for 4¼ per cent and 25 years to run as a basis for the settlement of the debts of nations.

Now, with this high indorsement of the principle that has been sponsored by the Southern Commercial Congress, we have the privilege of submitting to you for your consideration a plan involving the principle that may be employed in providing the funds with which to pay the cash as a bonus to soldiers and sailors of the United States.

The plan involves the issuance of bonds by the United States, to be exempt from taxation, carrying 5 per cent interest and one-half of 1 per cent for amortization, or $55,000,000 per billion dollars per annum, to retire the bonds in approximately 50 years. Herewith is a table indicating the amounts to be paid annually on account of interest and principal, showing the unpaid balance at the end of each year. If bonds are issued for one and one-half billion, then the annual fixed sum would be $82,500,000.

If this plan is adopted, the Congress of the United States would not find it necessary to raise taxation nor to find new sources of revenue, nor appropriate money coming into the Treasury of the United States from the usual sources. It would be necessary only to apply to the annual payments a part of the annual amortization to be received from Great Britain. No doubt in the near future other nations now indebted to the United States will be given a similar privilege as extended to Great Britain, and they will be making annual payments to liquidate their indebtedness to the United States.

With the hope that this plan will meet with your approval and that you will submit it to the Congress of the United States, I beg to remain,

Cordially and sincerely,

CLARENCE J. OWENS, President.

ATTORNEY GENERAL DAUGHERTY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate Resolution 157, submitted by Mr. WHEELER on February 13, as modified by him on yesterday, directing a committee to investigate the failure of the Attorney General to prosecute or defend certain criminal and civil actions wherein the Government is interested.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, during the course of my remarks this afternoon I read and discussed an article which I said emanated from the White House relative to efforts upon the part of the Government to recover section 36 in naval oil reserve No. 1. The article and the statement to which I referred indicated that the President himself initiated the movement and the proceedings to recover this property on behalf of the Government.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Senate Joint Resolution 71, by Mr. WALSH of Montana, introduced in this body January 28, 1924, passed the Senate on February 7 and passed the House of Representatives on February 16, requiring or directing the Secretary of the Interior to institute proceedings for the recovery of this property and authorizing the President of the United States to employ special counsel for that purpose.

I make the statement in order that the Senate and the country may understand that the Senate really initiated the proceeding and not the Chief Executive.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe we are to vote now. Before we vote, I wish to read a very short article from the Washington Times which has just been issued. The headlines are these:

M'LEAN A JUSTICE DEPARTMENT AGENT—LISTED AS DOLLAR-A-YEAR MAN—CARRIES SHIELD AND CREDENTIALS OF REGULAR OPERATOR, DISCLOSED BY PROBE.

[By Kenneth Clark, International News Service.]

Edward B. McLean, wealthy publisher and one of the central figures in the oil scandal, is a duly accredited agent of the Department of Justice, it was learned officially to-day.

McLean, whose secret telegrams have been under scrutiny by the Senate investigating committee for 10 days, is known as "a dollar-a-year man," it was revealed to-day. He possesses a shield and an operative's credentials.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] spoke this morning in very harsh terms of his colleagues in the Senate. It seems to me the fact that has just come to light in these hearings in regard to Mr. McLean, whose record has been of such an unsavory kind in this whole transaction, ought to be sufficient to convince even the junior Senator from Ohio that this resolution ought to pass, and that all of the Attorney General's acts should be carefully and fairly investigated.

Mr. President, one other word and I am through.

I regret that the junior Senator from Ohio, with whom I served in the House and for a short time in this body, took the course that he took this morning. I regretted to find that in order to defend conduct of the kind of which the Attorney General has been guilty, even that which he admits to be true, the Senator was willing to condemn all of his associates in the Senate, and to denounce their conduct as shameful and disgraceful.

Mr. President, it seems to me that characterizations by the junior Senator from Ohio of the conduct of his colleagues in this body during the short time he has been a Member of it are very unfair and very unjust. I could hardly believe my ears when I heard these characterizations indulged in by the junior Senator from Ohio. I hope that upon reflection, at some subsequent time, the junior Senator from Ohio will apologize to his colleagues in the Senate for the statements that he has made about them. In my humble judgment his criticism was wholly unwarranted, and it seems to me it should be apparent to him, because, so far as I have heard, he and his colleague from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] are the only persons who have defended the Attorney General; and the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] has not seen fit to bring a blanket indictment against his colleagues because they differed with him. It seems to me that if I were in such a hopeless minority I would not undertake to characterize as shameful and disgraceful the conduct of my colleagues.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I request the attention of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

In line 5 of page 2, after the word "the," I move to insert the word "alleged," so that it will read "the alleged failure," and so forth. I understand that is not objectionable to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 5, before the word "failure," it is proposed to insert the word "alleged," so that it will read "concerning the alleged failure," and so forth.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I had intended to offer a similar amendment, not only at that point but at others; but I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will cover the matter, and I hope it will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Now I desire to offer another amendment. In line 9, before the word "neglect," I move to insert the word "alleged," so that it will read "the alleged neglect," and so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 9, before the word "neglect," it is proposed to insert the word "alleged," so that it will read "the alleged neglect and failure," and so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. On line 2, page 3, I offer a similar amendment. I move to insert, before the word "neglect," the word "alleged."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 2, before the word "neglect," it is proposed to insert the word "alleged," so that it will read, "as well as the alleged neglect and failure of the said Attorney General."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. On page 3, in line 4, before the word "failure," I offer a similar amendment. I move to insert the word "alleged," so that it will read "his alleged failure."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 4, before the word "failure," it is proposed to insert the word "alleged," so that it will read "and his alleged failure to prosecute," and so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this point to insert in the RECORD three brief editorials which I have gone over carefully, and which I can assure the Senate contain no reflection upon any Member of the Senate but do relate to the matter of this resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the material may be inserted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Herald-Examiner of February 23, 1924.]

(By Arthur Brisbane.)

(Copyright, 1924, by Star Co.)

The fight between Attorney General Daugherty and the crowd trying to drive him out of office will be worth watching. The Attorney General is a fighter. His enemies include some able men.

One question is: Who are the men behind those that are trying to get rid of Mr. Daugherty?

The charges made against him are vague. That he had nothing to do with the Teapot Dome case everybody knows. Both Mr. Fall and Mr. Denby testified that the Attorney General was not consulted. Nobody asked his opinion. His duty and powers in the administration are limited to giving legal opinions when asked for them.

It is no part of his business to tell Cabinet officers that they are breaking the law, whatever his own opinion may be, unless the President or a Cabinet member asks for advice.

Some of Mr. Daugherty's enemies, that have real cause for wishing him out of office, keep very quiet in these proceedings. They include men that Daugherty accused of selling to themselves or to friends, for a nominal, dishonest price, property which they held as public trustees.

Mr. Daugherty brought legal proceedings against a collection of war profiteers and grafters and talked plainly about them. Some powerful men are included among those that have good reason to hate him.

The public will withhold its opinion concerning Mr. Daugherty until it knows whether he is being attacked in the interest of the public or in the interest of war grafters whom he attacked and exposed.

WITHOUT BENEFIT OF JURY.

Legislative impeachments are a historical part of the development of representative institutions. Legislative investigations, such as the oil inquiry at Washington, have quite another origin. When Indian war parties captured a prisoner and felt that the encampment deserved or desired entertainment, they bound him to a stake with a fire at his feet; the squaws did the rest. Lighted splinters were thrust into his body, the village danced around him, and he was slowly burned and whittled to death. The blood lust was sated, and, with one exception, a good time was had by all.

In form, and often in fact, a search for the truth, an American legislative inquiry resembles the Indian stake dance in that the person under examination is deprived of his rights as a man and subjected to torture for purposes of popular entertainment.

An American citizen is supposed to be entitled to his day in court and to representation by counsel there; and there is something in the Constitution about an impartial trial by a jury of his peers. He loses all these guaranties when he goes before a legislative inquiry, because in form it is not a trial at law. He has no right to counsel; only by grace can his lawyer be present, and if the latter's presence be permitted his power to help his client is so circumscribed that it may become nothing at all. What the accused says is under oath with a perjury penalty. But any Senator may call him a thief and scoundrel or make any false statement about him without taking oath or being held accountable therefor. * * * Private or partisan rancor has opportunities to wreak itself in slander beyond anything available to Venetian spies when they dropped their accusations in the lion's mouth.

The vice of such investigations is that while purporting to be inquiries merely, in fact they are trials, and trials that end as trials are bound to do when an accused person is not allowed to defend himself. The punishment is publicity, and sometimes it is heavier than a jail sentence. Innocent and guilty pass through the furnace together, and the casual malice of a single senatorial inquisitor will make them look so like that the public will not see the difference for three or four years afterwards, or will not see it at all. "That man was somehow mixed up in the oil investigation" is the label that a number of Americans, of both parties, some of them of far higher character than their official inquisitors, will wear the rest of their lives, simply because it has become a habit here to let mere committees of the National Legislature override personal rights that kings have been beheaded for ignoring.

Through a period of years we have followed the history of such investigations and have noted the betrayal of basic rights, the denial of constitutional guaranties, the conscienceless gratification of partisan necessities and personal grudges. We have appraised both the incidental good they do and the evil they intend and achieve. Our conclusion is found in Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, the Constitution, and other still respectable sources—that the place to try a man is before a jury in a court room and nowhere else.

GIVE DAUGHERTY A FAIR TRIAL.

No one in Ohio has less reason to love Harry M. Daugherty politically than ourselves. Our ways have been separate, our ideals different, our objects not the same, but notwithstanding this fact we do not hesitate to say that he is being most unjustly treated. Nothing has been proved against him. Not a charge that he could answer has been brought forth, except those disposed of by Congress when it voted almost unanimously that there was nothing substantial in the Kellar impeachment proceedings. Beyond this it is only rumor, inference, and gossip which may have behind them damaging truth or which may be false as hell. And yet a mighty hue and cry is raised even by good and sensible men that he should flee from the Cabinet and thereby confess his guilt. It is true they do not express it that way. They say it would relieve President Coolidge of embarrassment.

If Daugherty is guilty of violating the law or even compromising the great office he holds, Coolidge can duly be relieved of embarrassment by having that fact proved and Daugherty driven in disgrace from the high office he holds. It could not relieve the President of anything except his self-respect to crucify an innocent man upon the political crosses that are now being set up. If Daugherty is guilty he should not be spared, but he should not be lynched in advance of the establishment of his guilt by mob or any other kind of clamor. The thing has gone too far now to stop. The truth at the back of it should be fully established. But until that is done no one should demand that he should take a step which the whole world would say never would have been taken had he been innocent. To assassinate the body is a frightful crime, but to insist that he shall voluntarily perform an act which would destroy his whole future in order to satisfy clamor that is so far backed by no evidence is going entirely too far.

We repeat that if he is guilty he should not be allowed to escape the full consequences of that guilt. No question should be left about it even though it destroys good Democratic campaign material. It should be proved or disproved and until then, unless we have lost the spirit of fair play in this country, let us suspend judgment. In this we believe we express the sound opinion of the country, and we are doing it notwithstanding the fact that no love on political questions and methods between Mr. Daugherty and ourselves has ever been or is ever likely to be lost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified and amended.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that the preamble has been stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Action on the preamble will come after the vote on the body of the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think it should be understood that we have an agreement that the preamble will be stricken out.

Mr. EDGE. The question now is on the resolution by itself?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, may we have the resolution read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution as it now stands.

The READING CLERK. The resolution, as modified and amended, reads as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, consisting of three members of the majority and two of the minority, be authorized and directed to investigate circumstances and facts, and report the same to the Senate, concerning the alleged failure of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, to prosecute properly violators of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act against monopolies and unlawful restraint of trade; the alleged neglect and failure of the said Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, to arrest and prosecute Albert B. Fall, Harry F. Sinclair, E. L. Doheny, C. R. Forbes, and their coconspirators in defrauding the Government, as well as the alleged neglect and failure of the said Attorney General to arrest and prosecute many others for violations of Federal statutes, and his alleged failure to prosecute properly, efficiently, and promptly, and defend all manner of civil and criminal actions wherein the Government of the United States is interested as a party plaintiff or defendant. And said committee is further directed to inquire into, investigate, and report to the Senate the activities of the said Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and any of his assistants in the Department of Justice which would in any manner tend to impair their efficiency or influence as representatives of the Government of the United States.

That said committee above referred to and the chairman thereof shall be elected by the Senate of the United States.

Resolved further, That in pursuance of the purposes of this resolution said committee or any member thereof be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-eighth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ stenographic assistance at a cost not to exceed 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had in connection herewith, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now upon agreeing to the resolution as amended. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROUSSARD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], and not being able to secure a transfer, will withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. CAPPER's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CAPPER]. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDWARDS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair for the day with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I am not advised as to what the attitude of my pair would be upon this resolution, and therefore I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when Mr. OVERMAN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "yea." He is paired, however, with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. MCKELLAR (when Mr. SHIELDS's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIELDS] is unavoidably absent from the Senate to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARREL], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. STEPHENS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. In his absence, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY (when Mr. UNDERWOOD's name was called). The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is paired with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He is unavoidably absent on account of sickness. If present, he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is unavoidably absent. Also that the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] is necessarily absent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (when his name was called). I have a general pair for the day with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. If present, the Senator from Indiana states that he would vote as I intend to vote, and therefore being free to vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. He is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GLASS] is paired with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. He is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. I have been informed that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. BAYARD (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED]. When my name was called I thought he was present. I find, however, that he is absent. I now transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DIAL. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. It is my understanding that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PEPPER] would vote "yea" if present. He is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 66, nays 1, as follows:

YEAS—66.

So Mr. WHEELER's resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the Senator yield? We have not disposed of the preamble.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that the preamble is to be withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON. That was the understanding. It may be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] asks leave to withdraw the preamble of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it that the language introducing the resolution will have to be modified to some extent. It should begin merely with the word "Resolved."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the case. The Chair hears no objection, and the preamble to the resolution is withdrawn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, pursuant to the provisions of this resolution, I nominate as a member of the special committee for which the resolution makes provision, and as chairman of that committee, the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART].

In so designating him as chairman of that committee, I desire merely to say that it is in conformity with the precedents of the Senate. I had expected to speak upon this resolution and would have done so had not the Senator from Massachusetts withdrawn his proposed amendment. I take this opportunity to say that besides being in strict conformity with the rules of the Senate, it is no innovation in the practice of this body that both standing committees and special committees shall be elected by the Senate and not appointed by the Presiding Officer.

From my study of the question, I am unable to find that it has ever been taken as a reflection upon the Vice President, the President pro tempore, or any Senator who might chance to be the Presiding Officer of the Senate at the time such proposition was submitted.

Mr. President, although it is not so pertinent now as it would have been with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts pending, I beg just in a word to direct the attention of Senators to the fact that this investigation is the investigation by the Senate. Who, therefore, should select the investigators other than the Senate?

I have gathered together many of the precedents of the Senate providing for the election by the Senate of special committees, some of them naming the special committees in the resolution and some of them providing for the election by the Senate and leaving, as does this resolution in its modified form, the Senators to make nominations after it shall have been passed, just as we are proposing to do now. I say this because I am unwilling to let the record stand where it stood in conformity with the declaration of the senior Senator from Massachusetts, that it was a violation of precedent. It is nothing of the kind.

There has grown in the Senate, in conformity with the growth of machine manipulation of politics, the practice of attempting to control the selection of committees either through having them named by the presiding officer or by taking the business of the Senate into caucuses, in violation, I believe, of the Constitution. They transact the business there and then bring it in here and attempt to put it through, thus making the selection of committees, which are to control the business of the Senate, the office of caucuses held in secret, instead of choosing on the floor of the Senate, in the light of the public eye, the important bodies that control really the legislation of Congress. I hope, sir, that the time will come when all committees will be chosen in the Senate and not arranged for in secret conferences and caucuses.

I lay it down as a great fundamental principle of government that "no power ought to be delegated which can be fairly exercised by the constituent body."

Sir, I believe the time is near at hand when we will change the present practice of naming regular or standing committees of the Senate.

It is un-American; it is undemocratic. It has grown into an abuse. It typifies all of the most harmful practices which have led an enlightened and aroused public judgment to decree the destruction of the caucus, convention, and delegate system of party nominations.

Under the present system of choosing the standing committees of the United States Senate, a party caucus is called. A chairman is authorized to appoint a committee on committees. The caucus adjourns. The committee on committees is thereafter appointed by the chairman of the caucus. It proceeds to determine the committee assignments of Senators. This places the selection of the membership of the standing committees completely in the hands of a majority of the committee on committees, because in practice the caucus ratifies the action of the committee and the Senate ratifies the action of the caucus.

See now what has happened. The people have delegated us to represent them in the Senate. The Senate, in effect, has delegated its authority to party caucuses upon either side.

The party caucus delegates its authority to a chairman to select a committee on committees. The committee on committees largely defer to the chairman of the committee on committees in the final decision as to committee assignments.

The standing committees of the Senate so selected, Mr. President, determine the fate of all bills; they report, shape, or suppress legislation practically at will.

Hence the control of legislation, speaking in a broad sense, has been delegated and redelegated until responsibility to the public has been so weakened that the public can scarcely be said to be represented at all.

Mr. President, I believe the day is near at hand when Members of this body will refuse to permit the secret senatorial caucus to exercise any controlling action upon the public business.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that he put in the RECORD the precedents to which he has referred?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I shall do so.

One of the earliest precedents I came across in my examination of the subject arose on the 3d of March, 1803. At that time the Senate elected a select committee to consider the impeachment of Judge Pickering. This fact was cited by Senator Tazewell when the impeachment of Judge James H. Peck came up, April 26, 1830. The debates in Congress of April 26, 1830 (vol. 6, pt. 1, p. 384), read:

Mr. Tazewell then read from the Senate Journal as follows:

"In the Senate of the United States, March 3, 1808.

"On motion,

"Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of a district court, be referred to Messrs. Tracy, Clinton, and Nicholas, to consider and report thereon."

Report of the proceedings of the Senate at that time were not as now a chronicle of every statement made on the floor of the Senate, but a summation of what occurred.

In the Congressional Globe, Twenty-fourth Congress, first session, December 22, 1835, page 24, I find the following:

The Senate proceeded to ballot for a select committee to consider the President's message relative to the northern boundary of the State of Ohio and the application of the State of Michigan for admission into the Union, and Messrs. Benton, Wright, Clayton, Crittenden, and Preston were chosen.

On page 514 of the same volume, following debate regarding the deposit of public moneys on May 31, 1836, I quote as follows:

On motion of Mr. Calhoun, the whole subject was referred to a select committee of nine members, which, on balloting, was found to consist of Wright, Calhoun, Webster, King of Alabama, Buchanan, Hendricks, Shepley, Leigh, and Ewing of Ohio.

In the first session of the Thirty-second Congress a contest arose over the seat of the Senator from Florida, Hon. Stephen R. Mallory. Immediately upon the presentation of his credentials by Senator Morton question was raised as to his right to a seat. It was moved—and now I quote from the Globe—that the credentials of the Senator elect, together with the extract from the journal of the Florida Legislature, be referred to a select committee of five.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Gwin, the election of the special committee was postponed until 1 o'clock to-morrow.

* * * * * * *

The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the Senate proceeded to ballot for a special committee agreed to be appointed yesterday to consider and report on the Florida contested-election case.

The President announced that the Secretary had furnished him with the following result of the balloting: Mr. Berrien received 21 votes, Mr. Bright 21, Mr. Davis 21, Mr. Mason 17, and Mr. Pearce 12. These five gentlemen having received the highest votes, they were duly elected the special committee.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BERRIEN. I would inquire what was the whole number of Senators voting?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair can not tell. It is not usual to require a majority of the whole number to elect members of a select committee. They are elected by plurality.

Mr. BERRIEN. I was under the impression that it required a majority to constitute any act of the Senate. My impression is that we have several times balloted repeatedly for members of committees.

The PRESIDENT. The majority rule applies to standing committees.

* * * * * * *

The PRESIDENT. The rule on the subject, after speaking of the standing committees, says:

"All other committees shall be appointed by ballot, and a plurality of votes shall make a choice."

The Senate having under consideration the assault upon Mr. Sumner, the CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE of May 22, 1856, contains the following:

Mr. MASON. I move to amend the resolution in such a manner as to provide that the committee shall be elected by the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee of five Members be elected by the Senate to inquire into the circumstances attending the assault committed on the person of the Hon. Charles Sumner, a Member of the Senate, in the Senate Chamber yesterday; and that the said committee be instructed to report a statement of the facts, together with their opinion thereon, to the Senate."

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

That was not regarded as a reflection upon the Vice President or the President pro tempore.

APPOINTMENT OF A SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RETRENCHMENT.

On December 13, 1871, Mr. Anthony, of Rhode Island:

I offer the following resolution and ask for its consideration:

"Resolved, That a standing committee of seven, to be known as the Committee of Investigation and Retrenchment, be created to investigate and report on such subjects as may be committed to it by the Senate, such committee to be elected by the Senate as other standing committees."

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

This resolution was debated at length, the discussion extending over several pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and taking up the entire session. It was also debated through two or three other sessions of the Senate; and thereafter, on December 18, Mr. Anthony, of Rhode Island, perfecting the resolutions which he had submitted, added thereto the following:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Investigation and Retrenchment consist of Mr. Buckingham (chairman)."

There was a Member on the floor of this Senate assuming to nominate the members of that committee—to consist of Mr. Buckingham (chairman), Mr. Pratt, Mr. Howe, Mr. Harlan, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Pool, and Mr. Bayard.

The name of Mr. Casserly was later added as a member of the proposed committee.

The debate upon the resolution as perfected by Mr. Anthony proceeded throughout the session of December 18. The resolution was further amended by providing "that the said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers and report by bill or otherwise, and also to appoint a clerk."

While that was called a standing committee, all the debate shows plainly that it was a committee that was chosen upon the nomination of a Senator and with a view to searching the records of the departments of the opposition party. It was in character just like a special committee, although it was called a standing committee.

During the debate question was raised as to whether the resolution named the Senators who had been advocates of the Committee on Investigation and Retrenchment, and it was argued at some length that the committee should be composed of the Senators who had been most favorable to the forming of such committee.

Shortly before the adoption of the resolution the following proceedings occurred:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on adopting the amendment as amended.

Mr. VICKERS. I offer this amendment: To strike out the names in the original resolution, namely, "Mr. Buckingham (chairman), Mr. Pratt, Mr. Howe, Mr. Harlan, Mr. Stewart, Mr. Pool, Mr. Bayard, and Mr. Casserly," and in lieu thereof to insert "Lyman Trumbull (chairman), Charles Sumner, Eugene Casserly, Thomas F. Bayard, Henry B. Anthony, Roscoe Conkling, Oliver P. Morton, and T. W. Tipton."

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 27, absent 32.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question upon the final passage of the resolution creating the special committee and naming the members of the committee in the resolution being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 48, nays 1.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I nominate for membership on the committee the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I nominate for membership on the committee the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the election of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] as chairman of the committee authorized by the Senate. [Putting the question:] The ayes have it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the ayes have it unless there be a roll call demanded. The ayes have it, and Mr. BROOKHART, the junior Senator from Iowa, is elected as chairman of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I asked for a roll call. I do not know how many hands went up.

Mr. ELKINS. I also asked for a roll call.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that the result has been announced and that there were not a sufficient number held up their hands.

Mr. ELKINS. I did not hear any request to hold up hands. I asked for a roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The demand for the yeas and nays was not sufficiently seconded. The Chair announces again the ruling that the ayes have it, and Mr. BROOKHART is elected chairman of the committee.

The question now is upon the selection of the four remaining members of the committee, which, as the Chair understands the rule, may be selected en bloc. They are Mr. JONES, of Washington; Mr. MOSES, of New Hampshire; Mr. WHEELER, of Montana; and Mr. ASHURST, of Arizona. The question is upon the election of these Senators as members of the committee. As many as favor their election will say "aye"; opposed, "no." The ayes have it, and the Senators named are elected members of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the New York World of this morning which makes a substantially accurate statement concerning some startling testimony introduced before the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys on yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE WORLD GIVES TRANSLATED MESSAGES TO COMMITTEE—PUBLISHER REVEALED AS "SECRET AGENT."

(Copyright (New York World) Press Publishing Co., 1924. All rights reserved. Publication in whole or in part without permission prohibited.)

The World prints herewith the contents of the four most important of the code messages sent to Edward B. McLean in Palm Beach by his Washington agents during the disturbing opening days of the Teapot Dome investigation. These were among the messages made public in Washington Thursday by the Public Lands Committee of the Senate as being "entirely unintelligible."

As there is reason to believe the code which concealed the import of the messages is one used by agents of the Department of Justice, the World communicated their texts immediately to the Senate committee.

This was the committee's first clue to the real meaning of the mysterious communications. Literal translations were forwarded to the committee by mail late last night.

Department of Justice codes are limited by law strictly to working agents and for the transmission of official business. One of the first steps of the committee, it is now understood, will be to ascertain how such a code got into the possession of McLean and his confidants. Senate investigation also will show whether, as indicated, the code was used with the knowledge of high officials in the department under Attorney General Daugherty.

BURNS REVEALED AS M'LEAN INFORMANT.

One of the messages to McLean reveals William J. Burns, Director of the Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, as an active informant of McLean on developments in the Teapot Dome inquiry, and is the first direct link, except for one message from E. S. Rochester, between the department and any of the principals in the oil-lease scandal.

Another message of first importance advises McLean that certain "papers" have been placed in a safe-deposit box in the Commercial Bank in Washington, held jointly by him and George B. Fraser, his financial secretary. It now will be the business of the Senate committee to ascertain what these papers are and where they are at the present time.

When put together the Washington-Palm Beach series shows an effective "grapevine" of advance information to McLean, the important links in the chain of tip offs including the Department of Justice; Col. J. W. Zevely, attorney for Harry F. Sinclair and also confidential legal adviser to ex-Secretary Fall; Wilton J. Lambert, attorney for McLean; William O. Duckstein, a confidential employee of McLean in the offices of the Washington Post; and Miss Mary Quigley, chief telephone operator at the office of the Washington Post; in addition to Fraser, financial secretary to McLean.

Miss Quigley, already disclosed before the committee as an alert friend of her employer, is shown by to-day's translations to be one of the most important of the group. It was she who telegraphed Duckstein in Palm Beach that Burns had sent for her and told her to inform McLean that an investigation by Department of Justice agents was under way and that Burns believed "this information is important."

DUCKSTEIN'S WIFE IN FEDERAL EMPLOY.

Another link, not appearing on the surface of the messages, but important, is the reported fact that Duckstein's wife is or was a confidential stenographer in the Bureau of Investigation.

That there may be no clue to the form of the code in which the messages were written the World offers, not a translation, but paraphrases of their contents. These are as follows:

Arrival this morning in Washington of the exact translations of the code messages, and their examination by the Public Lands Committee will probably have an important effect on the question of the continuance of Harry M. Daugherty in President Coolidge's Cabinet. The intimate connection now shown to exist between the Attorney General's department and McLean during the Teapot Dome inquiry will increase the growing demand for his resignation, and, failing that, his forced retirement. The Burns message alone, it is thought, will prove a sufficient ground.

One defense likely to be offered by the department officials, it was reported last night, is that McLean has been for some time a secret agent, though for what purpose has never been disclosed. He wears an agent's badge under his coat, according to report, and has the regular credentials. But even this, it is pointed out, would not justify the use of a department code for private messages, nor would it account for the code being in the hands of Duckstein and Miss Quigley.

Another aspect of the situation which probably will figure in the further investigation of these messages is the fact that the Burns-Quigley message apparently disclosed the fact that an investigation had been started by the department.

One authority on Federal law informed the World last night that the disclosure of any official secret of this nature furnished grounds for a prosecution on a charge of conspiracy. All parties taking part in the disclosure of a confidential Department of Justice matter probably would be involved in the same charge, it was said.

AWARE OF CODE DANGER.

That the senders and receivers of the messages decoded yesterday were aware of the danger involved in the use of their code is indicated by the fact that they used it in only 4 messages thus far brought to light out of the 30 or more exchanged between the McLean camps during the course of the investigation.

The alleged Department of Justice code was dropped after January 11. A message signed "Chris," January 22, is in a different code. Then follows a series of undated messages in which the terminology of the orchard replaces the heavy phraseology of the previous code and the meanings are conveyed by references to "apples," "peaches," "apricots," and "cherries." The fruit messages have not been decoded by anyone outside the McLean circle, so far as could be learned last night.

One explanation of the sudden change in codes is found in the telegram from John Major to McLean, dated January 23, which the Senate committee made public on Thursday. This message shows that Duckstein, known as "The Duck," was under suspicion. Major telegraphed:

> "After you telephoned this morning instructions to Lambert, the Duck at once telephoned his wife and, according to Mary Quigley, who listened in on the line, said: 'I have them where I want them. I will make them bow to me before I am through. I am turning over this stuff without receipt, but you know my intentions.' Mary Quigley, whom I trust with any secrets you or I may have, informs me that Mrs. Duckstein said: 'Billy, you have the right idea at last.'"

Duckstein's alleged exclamation, "I have them where I want them," may, it is pointed out, have referred to the illegal use of the code, a conclusion further borne out by another caution from Major to McLean:

> "My advice to you is not to acquaint the latter party (the Duck) with our new code system. However, use your own judgment about that."

BURNS WAS DAUGHERTY'S CHOICE.

William J. Burns was appointed Director of the Bureau of Investigation of the United States Department of Justice by Attorney General Daugherty in 1921. He succeeded William J. Flynn, a former chief of the Secret Service.

Burns's appointment caused a protest from various quarters. Both former Attorney General Wickersham and Samuel Gompers were among those active in opposing him.

At the time of his appointment Burns was the directing head of the William J. Burns International Private Detective Agency, with a principal office in the Woolworth Building. Burns, following his appointment as head of the Department of Justice, announced he had withdrawn from his private agency and turned the business over to his sons, Raymond and Sherman.

Shortly after Burns took office he appointed Gaston B. Means as a special agent of the Government. Means had previously been employed as a private detective in the Burns Agency. Gaston B. Means was under investigation by the United States Military Intelligence for pro-German activities during the World War. He also had been tried and acquitted on the charge of murder of Mrs. Maud King, in Concord, N. C., in 1918. Means, according to Burns, was dismissed from the Government's pay roll following repeated protests received by Burns.

Means is now awaiting trial in Federal court here on charges of conspiracy in connection with liquor graft traffic.

Burns shortly after becoming head of the Department of Justice announced he would solve the Wall Street bomb explosion. At various intervals during that period he announced what on each occasion he termed a "positive solution," although different in each case. Before entering private detective work he was a Secret Service operative.

After leaving this position he became identified with the prosecution in the San Francisco graft inquiry. Following this he became active in running down the perpetrators of the Los Angeles Times dynamite explosion.

Burns's appointment by Daugherty was the result of a friendship formed while they were neighbors in Columbus, Ohio. The director maintains a New York home at Scarborough.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday, March 3, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 1, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord of life, Thy benediction enlightens, cheers, and blesses. Thy earthly children, we therefore own Thee as our Father and our God. Cause us to keep Thy precepts and walk in the ways of Thy wisdom. We thank Thee that we share Thy rational and spiritual nature and may draw our usefulness and happiness from the great infinite source of all truth. Let us hear the inward voice that speaks in terms of peace, righteousness, and purity, and keep us this day without sin. May the dawn of the morrow come to us with the breath of God, blessing us and making us to rejoice and be glad about our happy hearthstones. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to make an inquiry. I notice in the reading of the Journal it was stated that the gentleman from Oregon offered the following amendment to the Garner amendment. Of course, we all know what that means, but does the Journal show amendments by the name of the individual introducing them?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the amendments are reported by their number.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, so far as the RECORD is concerned, that is all right, but in the Journal, which is, after all, the official record of the body in any legal controversies or constructions that may arise, it occurs to me that to use the name of the individual might possibly be meaningless.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Journal clerk should make the correction according to the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As I recall it, the amendments are set out in the Journal, I believe, under some sort of number. I am quite sure that is correct. I simply call attention to that matter.

The SPEAKER. With the correction indicated, the Journal will stand approved.

There was no objection.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MADDEN, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 7449) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying report, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee reserved all points of order.

EXPUNGING REMARKS FROM THE RECORD.

Mr. MICHAELSON. Mr. Speaker, it has been called to my attention that remarks which I made under the privilege of extension contained matter in violation of the rules of the House. It has never been my intent, and is not now, willfully to violate any rule of the House, much less so in an extension of any remarks I may have the privilege of making. If that is so, and it seems to be so, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw, revise, and reextend my remarks upon this very important subject of water diversion from Lake Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw, revise, and reextend remarks he made in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I suggest to my colleague that the first part of his remarks contains a valuable contribution to the subject and contains much valuable information, and that he withdraw that portion of his remarks to which objection has been made. The rest of it is all right and is a valuable contribution to the subject.

Mr. MICHAELSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, but I would rather proceed the other way and withdraw the entire matter and revise and reextend if I may have that privilege.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his motion, which is in the RECORD, to strike out these remarks? This would not be in order otherwise.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think the motion is pending now. I am certainly entirely satisfied with the statement of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MICHAELSON. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with an agreement entered into by the trustees of the sanitary district of Chicago and Members of Congress representing Chicago districts, I, as the Illinois Member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, introduced in the House on November 9, 1921, a bill (H. R. 9046) providing for the amount of water which may be withdrawn from Lake Michigan by the Sanitary District of Chicago, giving authority therefor, and fixing the conditions of such withdrawal.

This bill, because of objections raised by the War Department, failed of passage. Believing that a study by the War Department of facts and figures subsequently presented relative to the Chicago drainage question will now bring about a favorable report, I reintroduced the bill (H. R. 6873) on February 11, 1924.

This bill, when passed, will authorize by law the withdrawal of 10,000 cubic feet of water per second from Lake Michigan, an amount which is necessary to properly dilute and take care of the sewage of Chicago's 3,000,000 population, thereby preventing pollution of our Lake Michigan drinking water and stamping out forever the dreaded typhoid fever. It will also make possible the construction of a 9-foot Illinois waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf.

The question of insuring pure drinking water to the people of Chicago, thereby protecting health, and the necessity of securing congressional action in the matter have been discussed for years, but no action has been obtained; and it is my purpose here to show what sinister interests and influences, in order to serve their own selfish desires for gain, power, or favor, have for years been gambling with the lives of 3,000,000 people and by publicity and the use of official power have been obstructing, delaying, and preventing congressional action having for its purpose a solution of this most serious problem.

Pure drinking water is essential to healthy human life. Ninety years ago the village of Chicago drank from wells; so did the city, until the wells became so filled with poison, which leaked through the sand from vaults and cesspools into the wells, that there was "death in the cup."

Then the water supply was dipped from the lake where its waves lapped the shore and water peddlers distributed it to the people for pay.

Then water was pumped from the lake a short distance from shore into tanks, from which it was conveyed through wooden pipes to the consumers. But it was not long before the shore waters became unfit for use, and the pipes through which the water was drawn had to be extended farther into the lake. Sewage was disposed of by discharging it into the Chicago River or directly into Lake Michigan.

As population increased so did the amount of filth which was discharged into the lake. The death rate from typhoid fever was higher than that of any other city in the country. The highest death rate was among the children and the poor people, who could not move away or afford water from any other source than the polluted waters of Lake Michigan.

Under these circumstances and for the purpose of protecting the public health the Sanitary District of Chicago was created as a public body under a State law passed by the Illinois General Assembly in 1889.

It was authorized to build a sanitary and ship canal connecting the Chicago River with the Des Plaines River and empowered to divert the sewage, which at that time polluted Lake Michigan, into the Mississippi watershed.

The State law required the sanitary district to dilute the sewage turned into the Des Plaines River on a basis of 3½ cubic feet of water per second for each 1,000 population. The main drainage canal, which is 32 miles long, 24 feet deep, and 160 feet wide, has a capacity of about 10,000 cubic feet per second, and was intended to care for a population of 3,000,000.

The Sanitary District of Chicago lies along the shore of Lake Michigan. About 10 miles west of the shore line, at a height of only 11 feet above Lake Michigan, is the summit between the Gulf of Mexico, 1,600 miles to the south, and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, 1,700 miles to the east. The city of Joliet, 40 miles from Lake Michigan, is 40 feet lower than Chicago. Nowhere else on the whole chain of lakes has nature provided for such a gravity flow from one watershed into another.

The main channel of the sanitary district, costing about $30,000,000, was built prior to 1899, but the water was not turned in until 1900, as the intercepting sewers connecting the city's sewers with the Chicago River and the drainage canal had not then been completed. Since that time the Chicago and Des Plaines Rivers have been improved by the district, and other branch canals, pumping stations, intercepting sewers, and sewage-treatment plants, representing a total cost of about $90,000,000, have been constructed.

The Chicago plan of sewage disposal by dilution and diversion from Lake Michigan, aided by the pasteurization of milk and the chlorination of water, resulted in a reduction of the typhoid death rate to the lowest point of any big city in the world. During the past year, however, with the sanitary district controlled by the Chicago Tribune, through its bipartisan combination, and the city of Chicago under Democratic rule, several hundred cases of typhoid fever, with numerous deaths, have occurred.

After the main channel had been completed, but before the water was turned in, Congress passed a law under which the War Department claims the right to limit the amount of water which may be taken from Lake Michigan for sewage dilution on the ground that the withdrawal by the district of the amount of water required under the Illinois law has reduced the levels of all the Great Lakes, except Lake Superior, by about 5½ inches, and is an obstruction to navigation and commerce.

Federal engineers and officials had full knowledge of the creation of the sanitary district and of the plan to reverse the flow of the Chicago River and to divert from Lake Michigan the amount of water needed to properly dilute the sewage of the district so that when discharged into the Des Plaines River it would not be offensive or injurious to the health of any of the people of Illinois.

As far as I am able to learn, no objection to this plan was made by Federal authorities at that time, and, prior to the opening of the canal in 1900, a permit for the diversion of 4,167 cubic feet of water per second—sufficient to care for a population of 1,250,000—was issued by the then Secretary of War. Since then, however, that office has consistently refused to grant permission for any greater flow, regardless of increased population, on the ground that Congress alone has authority to permit such diversion.

In the meantime the growth of population was so rapid that it became necessary, in order to protect the public health, to increase the amount of water used for dilution purposes as required by the Illinois law, but in excess of the amount authorized by the War Department permit.

The district contains about 450 square miles, including all of Chicago and about 50 other incorporated cities and villages in Cook County. It is governed by a board of nine trustees, three being elected every two years. The trustees have authority to levy annual taxes up to two-thirds of 1 per cent of the assessed valuation of all property within the district and may also issue bonds not to exceed 3 per cent of such assessed valuation.

The main diversion channel of the district was intended to care for an ultimate population of 3,000,000. We had reached that limit in 1920, to say nothing of the trade wastes which are equal to a population of at least a million and a half more—so some method of sewage disposal other than by dilution and diversion must be provided to care for the constantly growing excess in population.

To appease the rising wrath of the War Department, due to the alleged, but wholly theoretical, lowering of lake levels caused by the sanitary district's diversion at Chicago—stimulated no doubt by the demand of the water-power interests that all the waters of the Great Lakes this side of Niagara should pass over the Falls or through the turbines there, which produce immense profits for private owners of power privileges on both sides of the boundary—the trustees had on July 8, 1920, adopted an ordinance—

> Offering and agreeing to defray the expense of the construction of works in one or more of the outlets of the Great Lakes to compensate for any diminishing levels of the Great Lakes due to the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet of water per second from Lake Michigan by the Sanitary District of Chicago, etc.

In accordance with this program there was secured from the 1921 session of the Illinois Legislature two important amendments of the sanitary district act, one of which, in express terms, not only authorizes but requires the building by the district of sewage purification works, supplemental to the dilution system, to care for our constantly growing population, so that no further increase in the amount of water to be diverted from Lake Michigan would be necessary.

Another amendment authorizes the district to deal directly with the Federal Government and to pay for the construction of regulating or compensating works in the outlets of the Great Lakes to restore lake levels and justify Congress in passing a law permitting the continued use of our present sewage dilution system and the diversion of the amount of water now being used for that purpose.

At the same session the legislature, by joint resolution No. 41, unanimously passed, declared the policy of the State of Illinois in favor of the continued diversion of water from Lake Michigan for purposes of sanitation and to adequately supply the Illinois waterway. The resolution further provided for a commission of 10 persons, 4 appointed by the speaker of the house, 3 by the president of the senate, and 3 by the governor, to cooperate with the trustees of the sanitary district and the Illinois delegation in Congress to secure authority for the withdrawal of 10,000 cubic feet of water from Lake Michigan for said purposes. An appropriation of $15,000 for the expenses of this commission was also passed.

These laws were approved by Governor Small and became effective July 1, 1921.

In the meantime the attorney general of Wisconsin had, after several fruitless efforts, induced the legislature of that State to authorize him to file suit in the Supreme Court to restrain the State of Illinois and the Sanitary District of Chicago from diverting any water from Lake Michigan on the ground that such withdrawal lowers the lake levels, injures the ports and harbors of Wisconsin on Lake Michigan, and obstructs commerce and navigation.

The Wisconsin attorney general agreed to withhold suit until the trustees of the sanitary district had been given a fair chance to lay their plans before Congress. The suit of Wisconsin v. Illinois and the Sanitary District of Chicago was not filed until the October, 1922, term of the Supreme Court, long after it became apparent that because of some influence at work in Washington the proposed plan for early congressional action was being thwarted.

In furtherance of the plan to secure early and harmonious action a suggested form of a bill was prepared, and on September 20, 1921, the following invitation was sent to all Members of Congress from Illinois:

The trustees of the Sanitary District of Chicago expect to suggest to the Congress of the United States certain legislation which is necessary to protect the public health of the residents of the sanitary district and of the residents of the Illinois Valley, and would appreciate an opportunity to discuss the matter with you and the other members of the Illinois congressional delegation.

Finding that several Illinois Members of Congress are now in Chicago, the trustees earnestly invite you to be their guest at an informal luncheon to be held at room 103, Hotel La Salle, Chicago, on Friday, September 23, 1921, at 12.30 o'clock. We hope you can arrange to be present.

Several members of the Illinois delegation attended the conference, which was held in Chicago on September 23, and others who were unable to attend expressed their willingness to cooperate in the plan outlined.

At this conference, upon suggestion of Congressman MARTIN B. MADDEN, it was unanimously agreed that the proposed bill should be introduced by me, as I was the Illinois Member of the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I introduced the bill November 9, 1921 (H. R. 9046, 67th Cong., 1st sess.).

On the day of the conference, September 23, 1921, however, there was introduced in the Senate a joint resolution:

Requesting the President to invite the Government of Great Britain to join in the formation of an international commission, to be composed of three members representing the United States and three members representing the Dominion of Canada, to investigate the flow of water through the Chicago drainage canal and to make such recommendations as they may deem advisable to their respective Governments, looking to an agreement or treaty which will secure an adequate flow of water through such canal.

This resolution (S. J. Res. 116, 67th Cong., 1st sess.) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and if adopted by the Senate and concurred in by the House would have put the Government of the United States in the false position of admitting that Great Britain has some control over the inland waters of the United States, and consenting to representatives of the English Government having equal voice with our own in determining the use to which the waters of Lake Michigan, wholly within the United States, may be put. No action was taken on it.

As a matter of fact, under article 2 of the existing "treaty between the United Kingdom and the United States of America relating to boundary waters and questions arising along the boundary between Canada and the United States" (proclaimed May 13, 1910), each country "reserves to itself" the exclusive jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion of all waters on its own side of the boundary line "which in their natural channels would flow across the boundary or into boundary waters." This absolutely excludes Lake Michigan.

This treaty of 1910 created an international joint commission of six members, three representing the United States and three the Dominion of Canada, but it has no authority over diversions "existing" at the time, to which class the sanitary district diversion belongs.

My bill (H. R. 9046) was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House, which committee sent it to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, who forwarded the same to the United States district engineer at Chicago—Col. William V. Judson—who returned the same to his superior officer with a favorable recommendation. (See Doc. No. 2, Committee on Rivers and Harbors, House of Representatives, 67th Cong., 1st sess.)

Meanwhile, for the first time in many years, representatives of the sanitary district and the State government, through its executive and administrative officers and through the waterways commission, created under H. J. R. No. 41 of the Fifty-second General Assembly, were actively cooperating with the Illinois delegation in Congress, supported by the associations of commerce and other civic bodies in the State, to promote the passage of H. R. 9046, which, if successful, would not only have disposed of the injunction proceedings brought by the United States against the sanitary district, but would have saved the Wisconsin suit from being filed.

Engineering briefs in support of the Michaelson bill (H. R. 9046, 67th Cong.) were prepared by the Illinois Department of Public Works, division of waterways, and by the sanitary district for consideration by the Chief of Engineers of the United States. He, however, asked for more detailed information as to the financial capacity of the district and its ability to construct additional sewage treatment works in a shorter period than provided for in the bill.

The management of the sanitary district, the legislative and executive departments of the State government, the Illinois and Chicago Associations of Commerce, and many other State-wide commercial organizations had approved H. R. 9046, and all were working together in complete harmony; the engineers had prepared the information requested by the Chief of Engineers and were ready to submit the same, when, on January 6, 1922, like a bolt from the blue there came a message from Washington announcing to the trustees of the sanitary district that the Secretary of War had transmitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a report prepared by the Chief of Engineers, which report on the Michaelson bill was very prejudicial to its passage.

When I protested to the Chief of Engineers against this apparent breach of faith in not giving the State and sanitary district engineers a chance to supply the information prepared at his suggestion before making his report, that official stated in substance that his action had been taken by direction of the Secretary of War and at the instigation, as he understood, of a member of another body.

Subsequently, January 23, 1923, a bill was introduced in the Senate carrying provisions similar to the original Michaelson measure. The bill was referred for consideration to a "select committee" composed of five Senators, with Senator MCCORMICK as chairman, appointed under a resolution introduced by him January 16, 1923. This select committee has not yet reported.

In the meantime, on June 18, 1923, Joseph B. Fleming, of R. R. McCormick's law firm, acting as Special Attorney General of the United States, secured an injunction restraining the sanitary district from diverting from Lake Michigan more than 4,167 cubic feet of water per second, although over 8,500 cubic feet per second is now being used, and under the Illinois State law at least 10,000 cubic feet per second is required.

If this injunction should be sustained by the United States Supreme Court, in which it is now pending, it will reduce the present flow in the Drainage Canal by more than one-half. This will not only double the pollution of the Desplaines and Illinois Rivers but, since the run-off of water in the sanitary district is 10,000 cubic feet per second, the curtailment of the flow in the Drainage Canal will in times of heavy rainfall result in the reversing of the current of the Chicago River and send its sewage-polluted water into the lake to mingle with our drinking water—as it did recently, through the fault of some one, with dire consequences on the south side—thus carrying germs of typhoid fever into the homes of all residents of the sanitary district.

If Robert R. McCormick was sincere in his pretended hope and desire that the sanitary district would defeat the suit of the Federal Government to reduce to 4,167 cubic feet per second the amount of water to be withdrawn through the drainage canal and discharged into the Illinois waterway, how does it happen that Joseph B. Fleming (of the law firm of McCormick, Kirkland, Patterson & Fleming, of which this same Robert R. McCormick, "coeditor" of the Chicago Tribune, and sometime president of the sanitary district, is the titular head) was in 1922 appointed Special Attorney General of the United States to prosecute this old injunction suit which was started with the tacit approval if not at the instigation of Robert R. McCormick when he was president of the district?

Congressional authority to continue the present diversion of water, which would have saved the injunction from being issued, was provided for in the Michaelson bill, introduced November 9, 1921.

Responsibility for delay in securing congressional action and relief for the more than 3,000,000 people whose health is put in peril by the pending injunction does not rest upon my shoulders, although this false charge was printed in the Chicago Tribune.

Responsibility for the present wasteful and incompetent management of sanitary district affairs rests upon the Chicago Tribune and its family, who through a bipartisan deal and their control of publicity and patronage—not to mention any possible influence they may have with certain agencies of protection or prosecution—are able to dictate to the trustees of the district, a majority of whom make haste to carry out the Tribune's orders.

As evidence bearing out the facts here stated and called to your attention, I herewith submit excerpts from a letter recently received from William F. Mulvihill, a citizen of Chicago, who as former chief counsel for the drainage board made an investigation and a thorough study of this entire subject:

FEBRUARY 25, 1924.

In re the Sanitary District of Chicago.

Hon. M. A. MICHAELSON,
Representative in Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MICHAELSON: Permit me to call to your attention the inclosed clippings from the Chicago Tribune which falsely charges you with responsibility for the failure of the Sanitary District of Chicago to secure congressional authority to withdraw 10,000 cubic feet of water per second from Lake Michigan for the purpose of diverting the sewage of said district from Lake Michigan into the Mississippi watershed.

Having been chief counsel for the sanitary district of Chicago for more than two years and also special counsel in the so-called lake level controversy for one year thereafter, I am in a position to know that these charges are absolutely false and that, as a matter of fact, you, on November 9, 1921, introduced in Congress a bill expressly authorizing such diversion.

Fearing that these untrue publications might escape your notice, I take the liberty of calling your attention to the same and to the following facts, which place the responsibility for playing politics with the public health of 3,000,000 people where it belongs.

I charge, first, that the Chicago Tribune, although pretending to be a Republican newspaper, pursues a rule-or-ruin policy in politics, and that after its candidates for trustees of the sanitary district were defeated in the Republican primary of 1922 the Tribune bolted the party ticket and supported the Democratic nominees.

I charge, second, that after the Tribune had fooled enough Republicans into voting for the Democrats to defeat the Republican nominees the Tribune forced a bipartisan combination between these Democrats and certain hold-over Republicans, whereby, since that time, the Tribune has controlled a majority of the board of trustees of the sanitary district, and, through that control, the district's annual appropriation bill has been doubled in two years, being boosted from $19,000,000 in 1922 to $38,000,000 for 1924.

I charge, third, that this increase in the sanitary district's budget, under the Tribune's bipartisan board, has provided a reservoir of political jobs, which are being used to build up a bipartisan organization to promote the political ambitions of members of the family which owns and publishes the Chicago Tribune.

I charge, fourth, that Robert R. McCormick, former president of the sanitary district, now editor of the Chicago Tribune and a member of the law firm of McCormick, Kirkland, Patterson & Fleming, is more responsible than any other one man for the Federal injunction against the district, now pending in the United States Supreme Court, which if sustained will reduce by more than one-half the amount of water now being withdrawn from Lake Michigan and which is essential for diluting the sewage of Chicago before diverting the same through the Chicago drainage canal into the Des Plaines and Illinois Rivers.

I charge, fifth, that this injunction, procured by Joseph R. Fleming, McCormick's law partner, as "Special Attorney General of the United States," on June 18, 1923, if sustained, will, in times of heavy rainfall, reverse the current of the Chicago River and again send its sewage polluted water into the lake to mingle with our drinking water as it did before the drainage canal was dug, when the annual death rate from typhoid fever ran as high as 170 per 100,000 of population.

You will recall, Congressman, that in 1921 the Illinois Legislature amended the sanitary district act authorizing the district to build sewage-purification works, supplemental to its dilution system, so that no increase in the amount of water withdrawn from Lake Michigan will be necessary, and authorizing the district to pay for the construction of compensating works in the outlets of the Great Lakes, to restore lake levels, and justify Congress in permitting the continued use of our present sewage-disposal system, which has cost the taxpayers $100,000,000.

After Governor Small had approved these amendments and the aid of the Illinois State government had been enlisted, a meeting of the Illinois congressional delegation was held in Chicago on September 20, 1921, to agree upon a plan for securing early congressional authority to continue the present amount of diversion, which would have put an end to the litigation and have made the creation of the present bad situation impossible.

I feel, Congressman, that because the public health of the people of the sanitary district has been put in peril and because the false attacks made upon you in the Chicago Tribune and its allies are attributed to your opponent—who is affiliated with the Tribune political faction and who is drawing a fat salary from the sanitary district for very little work—it is my duty to call your attention to the facts. I trust that you may be able in some way to inform your constituents and the residents of the sanitary district of the real situation and place the responsibility for the delay in securing congressional action and for the present wasteful and incompetent management of the sanitary district where it belongs.

Yours very truly, WILLIAM F. MULVIHILL.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 3265. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge between the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens, in the city and State of New York;

H. R. 3681. An act to authorize the building of a bridge across the Waccamaw River, in South Carolina;

H. R. 4808. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Pearl River between St. Tammany Parish in Louisiana and Hancock County in Mississippi;

H. R. 4807. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Louisiana to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across West Pearl River in the State of Louisiana; and

H. R. 584. An act to authorize the county of Multnomah, Oreg., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Willamette River, in the city of Portland, Oreg., in the vicinity of present site of Sellwood Ferry.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 383. An act for the relief of William R. Bradley, former acting collector of internal revenue for South Carolina; to the Committee on Claims.

WILLIAM H. FULHAM AND BELLE DUPRÉ.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the following reports from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 200.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to William H. Fulham the sum of $203.33 and to Belle Dupré the sum of $103.33, being the amount received by them per month as clerks of the late Hon. H. Garland Dupré.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 195.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be authorized to appoint an assistant clerk to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $3 per diem during the sessions of the Sixty-eighth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, payment to commence from the date such clerk entered upon the performance of duties, which shall be ascertained and evidenced by the certificate of the chairman of said committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Is this the usual provision made at each session of Congress for assistant clerks?

Mr. MacGREGOR. This has been done ordinarily, only the per diem has been $6 instead of $3. We have cut it $3.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Let me ask this question: Does this increase the number of clerks for the committee over what it was in previous sessions or is it the same number? In other words, how does the present force compare with other sessions?

Mr. MacGREGOR. The Committee on Enrolled Bills has one clerk. This gives him an assistant clerk and has been customary.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say that, but how many clerks did they have during the last Congress?

Mr. MACGREGOR. They had the same. We gave the clerk an assistant clerk.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Throughout the major portion of the Congress?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes; during practically all of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a competent man and you have been paying $6. Why is it you cut him to $3 unless you expect to work him half the time? That is a rather unusual thing.

Mr. MACGREGOR. During a good many Congresses they have been paid a per diem, sometimes three and sometimes four, at so much per diem. The chairman of the committee now seems to think he can get along with this one man as a comparing clerk with the regular clerk at this rate.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. I am a member of this committee. Would the gentleman mind giving me five minutes on this resolution?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Certainly not. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to call attention to the peculiar actions of inconsistency on the part of the House of Representatives concerning various measures. We are now voting to pay a clerk $3 a day as compensation. This is supposed to furnish him a livelihood. Yesterday and day before we had a proposition up here concerning the several hundred traveling employees of the Revenue Bureau, and in addition to the big salaries they are to draw and in addition to paying all their transportation expenses, the House of Representatives, over my protest, allowed them $7 a day additional for subsistence alone.

Mr. GILBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT. Does the gentleman know what service this clerk performs?

Mr. BLANTON. The service of an extra clerk to the committee. I presume if he does not perform some service valuable to the country he ought not to be appointed, but if he is appointed he ought to be paid more than $3 a day for the House to be consistent, especially when the House went on record yesterday in favor of $7 per day allowance to employees for subsistence. I asked that the rate of subsistence allowance be reduced from $7 to $5 and the House voted down that amendment and insisted on paying an allowance for subsistence of $7 a day in addition to transportation and salaries to certain other employees of the Government. And yet on this occasion we are giving a clerk for the performance of duties $3 a day. If the duties are not worth performing, he ought not to be appointed.

Mr. GILBERT. For the gentleman's enlightenment I will say that this clerk is a temporary clerk to read and compare the bills. The chairman said he could find a young lady thoroughly competent who would listen while some one else read to see if the comparison was correct, and he could get the service for $3 a day; and if so, why pay more?

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman that for such work you can get an efficient young lady for that remuneration. At the same time, what I was calling the attention of the House to was that if a young lady can live on $3 a day—furnish board, room rent, and clothe herself properly—surely other employees of the Government on good salaries, with the payment of all their transportation expenses, should not be allowed $7 a day additional for subsistence, but that $5 would be sufficient.

Mr. GILBERT. This young lady only gives a part of her time. I would say that I am on that committee—not only in the Directory but in fact—and have examined into this matter, and I think it is a reasonable and proper allowance.

Mr. BLANTON. Has my distinguished friend and ex-jurist from Kentucky ever seen an employee of the Government who gave more than part time? Part time is the practice and custom in these days. All give part time to the Government. I was merely protesting against the extravagance of the House yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLING CLERK.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up a further resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 199.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, from and after February 1, 1924, compensation at the rate now paid for the services of an enrolling clerk to act during the illness of the present incumbent.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA POLICE AND FIRE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5855) to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force and the fire department of the District of Columbia; and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], the ranking member of the minority, and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5855.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes also to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the people of Washington and the whole Nation were startled a few days ago when the news came to them that United States Senator GREENE, of Vermont, was shot down while peacefully walking along historic Pennsylvania Avenue, literally in the shadow of the Dome of the Nation's Capitol, during a pistol battle between bootleggers and officers of the law.

This incident has done more than anything else to focus the attention of the public on the bold activities of outlaw liquor dealers and the entire question of law enforcement. Properly and rightfully the people are demanding to know why it is not safe for law-abiding citizens to walk along the best-known street in the country within almost a stone's throw of our Nation's Capitol Building, where our laws are made.

TIME TO SPEAK OUT.

I say that the time has come for some one to speak out and endeavor to place the blame on the right shoulders for the condition which made possible this outrageous occurrence. If a prohibition officer is guilty of carelessly shooting firearms, he should be punished.

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems that every effort is being made by certain interests in Washington to fix the entire responsibility on the Federal agent, who with police officers of the district, surprised a band of bootleggers who were boldly unloading a whisky still in the heart of the Nation's Capital, and when the officers came upon them, they engaged the latter in a pistol battle which resulted in the shooting of Senator GREENE.

BOOTLEGGERS FAVORED.

I regret to have to say that it appears that the effort to make the Federal prohibition agent solely responsible for this shooting is not restricted to wet committees and organizations. Immediately after the shooting the Federal agent was placed under arrest and kept in jail until late the following afternoon before being released on bond. The next morning the bootleggers who escaped the officers the night before were arrested and immediately released on bond of $3,000 apiece, while the prohibition agent had to furnish bond for $5,000 when he was finally given his freedom.

Why this discrimination against the officer of the law and this tenderness toward the bootleggers by officials in Washington who are supposed to uphold the law? I assert that the bootleggers who were involved in this affair should have been kept in jail without bond until all danger that Senator GREENE would lose his life had been removed. Why did not the United States District attorney here in Washington see that this was done?

BOOTLEGGERS' PATRONS MUST SHARE BLAME.

I charge that this is just an illustration of the attitude of powerful influences in the Nation's Capital toward the illegal, disgraceful, and notorious traffic in booze which has been thriving in Washington. And the greatest shame and disgrace of it all is, that there are many, so we are told, who are high in the official and political life of the Nation, people of supposed intelligence and education, those of social and financial standing who stand back of the bootlegger by patronizing their contemptible illegal business. These people of the gay night life mixing their cocktails and highballs are the first to speak in superior condemnation of the officers who take their lives in their hands when they interfere with the bold bandits who are engaged in supplying these thirsty patrons.

If these people had sufficient respect for the Federal Constitution and the law of the land to control their selfish appetites, the so-called "society" bootleggers would starve to death, and the likelihood of pitched battles on the public streets, endangering the lives of law-abiding citizens, would be almost removed. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, I say to the people of the country who would know why a United States Senator was shot down on Pennsylvania Avenue the other day, that they can first of all put the blame on the careless, indifferent, selfish patrons of the bootleggers, especially those who boast of their standing in the community and who therefore serve as examples for the poor and the ignorant to follow.

LAW OFFICERS SCORED.

Next among those who deserve the condemnation of all right-minded citizens are those public officials charged with enforcing the law, who fail to do their duty earnestly, honestly, and without fear or favor. I grant you that these officials have no easy task, but unless they are willing to do their best and try to perform their sworn duty they should surrender their places to others more ready or more competent.

The best men available should be given a free hand to enforce the law. I charge that this has not been done in Washington. Young inexperienced lawyers are assigned by the district attorney to prosecute cases against bootleggers, while the bootleggers have the best talent obtainable to defend them.

Only a few days before Senator GREENE was shot it was announced that several deputy United States marshals in the District had been suspended from office for alleged complicity with a rum-running syndicate. It does not seem to me that either the district attorney or the United States marshal take the prohibition enforcement question with sufficient seriousness.

POLITICS CAUSES TROUBLE.

Mr. Chairman, a large number of the prohibition-enforcement officers honestly try to do their duty and enforce the law, but just as long as men are appointed to the difficult task of enforcing prohibition because of political influence and backing, enforcement of the law will be neglected. Many of those appointed as prohibition-enforcement officers are not chosen for their qualifications or because they honestly believe in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment but, by reason of strong political influence, enforcement officers have been appointed who were not in sympathy with the law. It is charged that politicians have cooperated with dishonest enforcement officers and collected their share of the spoils. It is a known fact which can not be challenged that many of the politically appointed enforcement officers, while on the pay roll of the Government have spent a large part of their time in working at the political game in the interest of the politicians who were responsible for their appointments. And this is one of the chief reasons why prohibition enforcement has not been more effective.

Politics should have no place in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. It is not a party question. The whole enforcement of prohibition should be taken away from the politicians and placed into the hands of some department of government under one head who would be held responsible for the enforcement of the law.

POLITICAL APPOINTEES PILL BUREAU.

The work of prohibition enforcement is hard enough without being complicated because of political obligations and entanglements. To-day the Federal prohibition bureau is full of political appointees from the top to the bottom. The time has come when the people are going to demand that our prohibition officials see to it that the law is enforced. I have come to the conclusion that some of the officers who have been appointed are not now and never have been in sympathy with the enforcement of the provisions of the eighteenth amendment to our Constitution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Men high up in legislative activities and prominent newspapers are advocating that prohibition-enforcement officers should be disarmed. How could there be any enforcement as against armed bootleggers if we disarmed our enforcement agents?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I think the gentleman's question answers itself.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I have only a little time, and I wish the gentleman would permit me to proceed without interruption at present. Finally we have the wet propagandists themselves, who by their activities, their utterances, and their declarations encourage violation of the law.

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I received an amazing communication through the mail relative to the recent unfortunate shooting of Senator GREENE.

WETS ENCOURAGE LAW VIOLATIONS.

This communication came to me from an organization styling itself the "Joint legislative committee of the American Federation of Labor, National Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, Constitutional Liberty League, and the Moderation League Incorporated." It states that James Duncan, first vice president of the American Federation of Labor is chairman, and one James C. Espy is publicity director. The committee headquarters are at the New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.

The communication which I referred to a moment ago reads, in part, as follows:

> We charge that United States Prohibition Commissioner Roy A. Haynes has incited his agents to commit murder in the enforcement of the prohibition law. There are instances where Federal prohibition agents have attacked and shot innocent citizens. The indiscriminate use of firearms by the several thousand armed agents of the enforcement department has become a menace to the lives and safety of the people, and nobody has done anything about it.

We all deplore the shooting of Senator GREENE. Among his colleagues in the Senate and the Members of the House of Representatives with whom he served for years with distinction and credit to his State and Nation, no party lines nor other distinctions separate us in the common shock which we experienced when the news was brought to us that he had been wounded.

LIQUOR OUTLAWS HAVE BLOODY RECORD.

But, to my mind, those who are responsible more than anyone else for this outrage are attempting to throw out a smoke screen under which they would cover their guilt and shame. The liquor outlaws have written a bloody record since the advent of prohibition. They have defied all our laws, and in the very shadow of the Nation's Capitol they were caught violating the fundamental law of the land.

This wet organization or committee which makes the public charge that the Federal prohibition commissioner has incited his agents to commit murder does not utter one word of criticism of the bootleggers who were caught in the act of unloading from an automobile a whisky still almost within a stone's throw of this Capitol Building at the point where Senator GREENE was shot. Not one word do we hear from them which even slightly reflects on these law violators.

During the last two or three years from 35 to 50 Federal officers have been killed by bootleggers and rum runners. I now challenge this organization to show where they have on any single occasion expressed any regret for the murder of these officers who were trying to carry out their sworn duty. Many of these victims were young men. They are survived by families with little children who must now face life's battle alone. Some of them fought under our flag during the World War and passed through all the major engagements of the great conflict without a scratch from the enemy, only to be murdered by bootlegging assassins after they returned home.

WETS DON'T CONDEMN BOOTLEGGERS.

Whisky runners and bootleggers killed these officers, but we do not hear one word of condemnation from the lawless liquor-traffic advocates or this organization of personal-liberty howlers who have their headquarters at the seat of our Government in Washington and are now challenging the right of the American people to enforce laws that have been enacted by the orderly process of Government.

That such an accident to a prominent Senator should be seized upon by a wet organization for propaganda purposes is an outrage and insult to every law-abiding citizen. Their attitude gives encouragement to the bootlegger and whisky runner and to a large extent is responsible for the shooting of prohibition-enforcement officials. The demand which they make that the officers of the law shall not be permitted to defend themselves is an open invitation to every criminal in the country to violate the law with impunity. [Applause.]

Their charge that prohibition agents are invited to shoot is a falsehood, for the instructions given them are never to use firearms except in self-defense.

LIQUOR OUTLAWS SHOOT TO KILL.

How long should an officer stand as the target for the bullets of the outlaw rum runner? Shall we permit those who have no respect for the laws of the land to kill those who are trying to enforce a plain provision in the Constitution? [Applause.]

To-day we find the outlaw bootlegger and rum runner with high-powered motor cars, equipped with smoke screens to throw off pursuit. Armed to the teeth, these criminals of the liquor traffic are the most desperate and dangerous group of organized bandits in our country.

They deal in poison and ply their trade with murder and bloodshed. A short time ago these outlaws killed a Federal officer, and, not content with his death, they poured 76 shot in the dead body of their victim. These are the type of criminals who make it unsafe for law-abiding citizens to walk the streets day or night.

About two months ago, in my own State of Ohio, in the dead hour of the night, bootleggers dynamited the home of a prohibition agent, seriously injuring the officer's wife and baby. Two or three weeks later this same brave officer was stabbed to death by whisky runners in my home city. But this foul murder was not wholly unexpected, for the organized band of law violators had served notice that they would kill him or anyone else who attempted to interfere with them while they were plying their unlawful business.

SHOCKING MURDERS COMMITTED.

It is only a short time ago that the country was shocked by the slaying of Federal Prohibition Officer Stewart, of Buffalo. This officer was killed by the riffraff who put no value on human life. But these murders do not stop the ceaseless propaganda by the wets, who are seeking to break down the law of the land and thereby encouraging those who are engaged in bootlegging and whisky running to kill those who would balk them.

Recently the sheriff of Franklin County, Ind., was shot and killed by whisky runners whom he surprised. A patrolman of South Bend, Ind., was killed and another seriously wounded in a fight with bootleggers. Booze bandits in ambush fired on Federal officers who were returning from a raid in Floyd County, Ind., in an attempt to rescue prisoners whom they had taken. All of these are recent events; but we have not heard one word for law observance; we have not heard one word of condemnation from this so-called joint legislative committee which is trying to divert the attention of the country from the criminal to the officers of the law who are endeavoring to enforce a constitutional provision against the sale of intoxicating liquors.

WHISKY RUNNERS BUSY.

Last week an officer of the Unted States Coast Guard testified before a committee of Congress that the whisky runners along our coasts go armed to the teeth and frequently fire upon the Coast Guard men when the attempt is made to capture them.

I believe that Congress and the States should pass additional laws to severely punish the murderous bootlegger and whisky runner who are at large in many parts of our country, determined to kill those who try to prevent them from selling their poison liquor. [Applause.]

Let me say to this committee and the National Association Against the Prohibition Amendment and other organizations of like character that they would command greater respect from the American people if they would proceed in an orderly and lawful way to carry on their campaign for the repeal of the national prohibition act, instead of quickly coming to the defense of whisky runners and encouraging them to carry on their unlawful business.

WORKERS WON'T AID WETS.

Mr. Chairman, in closing let me say it is no credit to labor organizations to have Mr. James Duncan, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, as chairman of this wet committee. It is no credit to Mr. Duncan, who has been a leader of organized labor for years, to allow his name to be used by an organization which would nullify the Constitution of our Republic and put obstacles in the way of law enforcement. It is to be regretted by the decent, law-abiding workmen that Mr. Duncan can not find something more worth while to do for the benefit of wage earners than to place himself at the head of an organization which seeks the return of the liquor traffic, which was ever the arch enemy of the workingman and his family. [Applause.] But the workers will not assist him in this effort to flood the country with wet propaganda. He has allowed himself to be used as a tool of wet agitators who are misrepresenting the thought and attitude of the decent, sober-minded, law-abiding working classes of our Nation.

An overwhelming majority of the American wage earners stand for law and order, not for moonshine whisky and nullification. They stand for opportunity and decency, not for crime and drunkenness. [Applause.]

PROHIBITION SURE TO BE TRIUMPHANT.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to express the hope that nothing I have said here to-day will cause anyone to think that I am fearful of the future of prohibition. I am not, because I have faith in America and the American people. Our people have always met a great crisis when it came. And sooner or later the citizens of our country will be aroused and demand that the laws against the liquor traffic be fully enforced. For the sake of our country, for the sake of clean politics and good government, for the sake of the home, for humanity's sake, let all good citizens unite and put an end to present wanton disregard for the Constitution and the law of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I have sent a letter to the Clerk's desk, written to Commissioner Curran, which I ask the Clerk to read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 11, 1924

To Mr. CHARLY CURON

Imigration Commissioner of Ellis Island N. Y.

So I read in the newspapers that you ar from Congresman Johansons grup as against the Imigration and your advers to clos the American dors for Imigration. So you should know that next year 1925 will be a demecratic President in the White house and he will nok our your hed from the Immigration office he will apoint a liberal man as Imigration Commissioner in Ellis Island and you should remember if the Imigration law will be pasd so like you want so all the republican caundiats for offices from the President and down wil be defidet by next election—

FROM CITIZEN OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, partisan politics has not up to this year entered into the question of immigration legislation. It was a hundred years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence before Congress enacted any restrictive immigration laws at all, and it was only then because certain foreign countries were literally shipping their paupers and convicts to America. Later Democratic and Republican Congresses passed immigration bills only to be vetoed by Republican and Democratic Presidents. In 1917 our present basic immigration law was passed by a Democratic Congress over the veto of a Democratic President. In 1921 it was a Republican President who signed the present quota law. I want to say, as my friend and colleague from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has just said in respect to prohibition, that there is no room for partisan politics in solving the immigration problem. It is a purely patriotic question involving American traditions and ideals. Democrats and Republicans alike, in my opinion, are equally loyal in their desire to protect America and the American people from the influx of immigrants that threaten to come to the United States at the present time. [Applause.] The partisan issue was not raised until what I term a foreign bloc raised its head and held out its votes to the Republican Party and to the Democratic Party alike, offering its support and votes to the party that would assist them in the defeat of the immigration bill, and threatening the defeat of the other party.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. If this bloc, which has the influence to which the gentleman has referred at this time, is permitted to increase itself in the coming years by a further influx of immigration, what sort of a situation would the gentleman anticipate we will have in four or five or ten years from now when we attempt to pass restrictive measures?

Mr. CABLE. A more difficult situation. I submit that the Democrats and the Republicans must unite in forming an "American bloc" and that neither need yield to the foreign influence.

Mr. BOX. In view of the fact that five of the seven Democrats of the House Committee on Immigration have joined in the report favoring the Johnson bill, and the probability that it will be almost solidly supported by the Democrats of the House, to what place will these gentlemen who threaten our patriotic Republican brethren be forced to go for comfort?

Mr. CABLE. They will have no place, unless they return to the foreign countries in whose nationals they seem more interested.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. Yes. But before I yield I want to say that the question of partisan politics has never been raised in the House Committee on Immigration since I have been a member, and it should not have been raised in this House.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman designate the bloc in the House which the gentleman says has been formed on the immigration bill, and what pledges or promises they had made as to what legislation to defeat?

Mr. CABLE. They propose to defeat H. R. 6540. As the gentleman knows, that bill was reported to the House by the committee on February 9. Yet, according to the Boston Transcript of February 7, a report was sent from Washington to New England stating that certain Italians had come to Washington and that they had conferred with certain Congressmen, and that these Congressmen had agreed to work against the bill.

Mr. SABATH. What I want to know is the bloc in the House?

Mr. CABLE. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SABATH. And on what legislation they had made a deal.

Mr. CABLE. I will answer the gentleman's question. Here is the report that was broadcasted throughout the New England States by the bloc that came here to defeat the bill:

Let me read to the gentleman the last paragraph of the special dispatch appearing in the Boston Transcript the 7th of February. After naming the Congressmen pledged against part of the bill, it states:

> Mr. Petetti said that apparently Congress intends to pass the House bill. He added that if the measure should pass in its present form he was afraid the Italian voters of Massachusetts, New York, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, who are practically all Republicans, will leave the party in a body. The delegation intends to return to Boston tonight to begin a series of mass meetings against the bill.

That delegation did not come here as American citizens, but as a foreign nationality or group to oppose the bill.

I have here a report from the New York Herald of February 9, the day on which the bill was reported out, wherein it is stated that Representative LAGUARDIA, of New York, said and predicted that if the bill passed, New York City in the next election would go 500,000 Democratic and make it impossible for the Republican vote up State to overcome the lead, thus losing the State in the Electoral College.

I repeat, partisan politics have no place in this patriotic question. It is a nonpartisan proposition, and it is a serious matter to determine who shall come to the United States and who may become American citizens. Congress must not be dictated to by a foreign bloc in framing the law.

Mr. SABATH. I agree with the gentleman, but I would like to know the bloc. I understand the term "bloc" is used in Congress when a group of Members get together and fight for or against certain legislation. You have charged that there has been such a group formed here for the purpose of defeating this legislation and has made arrangements, or a deal, to support or defeat some other legislation.

Mr. CABLE. I will not yield to the gentleman to make a speech. I have made that statement before. If this newspaper report is true, these people coming from the New England States show that there is a bloc.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman read into the RECORD a letter from some alien threatening the Republicans in case this restrictive law was passed. I presume the gentleman knows that we Democrats are also receiving similar letters, threatening a Republican administration if we refuse to accede to their wishes.

Mr. CABLE. Yes; that is the way the game is being played, both ends against the middle. I want to show that partisan politics has been injected into this proposition by the foreign bloc. For example, here is what Major Curran, commissioner of immigration at Ellis Island, said:

> I had a telegram from a Congressman the other day demanding the admission of a certain Greek immigrant because, he said, the Greek vote in his city depended upon the admission of that immigrant, and there were 8,000 Greek votes in that city. Just what is a "Greek vote" in America? What business has it to be here?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. BLANTON, may I have five minutes more?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. CABLE. I want to call further attention to the influence that is being brought to bear. Take the city of New York, for example. The foreign stock constitute 80 per cent of the population. Only 20 per cent of the people of the city of New York are native born of native-born parentage. What happens in the city of New York? I read from the New York American of February 20, 1924, the following:

> The board of aldermen yesterday unanimously adopted a resolution petitioning Congress to defeat the Johnson immigration bill.

That shows the effect of the foreign born in the United States in attempting to dictate to Congress what laws should be passed and what should be defeated.

Now, the St. Louis Globe-Democrat—what does it say? On February 16, 1924, in an editorial the St. Louis Globe-Democrat says:

> Warnings that the State of New York will be lost to the Republicans next fall if the bill passes are not to be taken too seriously. The regulation of immigration has never been a partisan issue, and the humane provisions of this bill ought to appeal to rather than affront the naturalized vote in the East, whose alienation is alleged to be threatened.

The New York Times of February 26 says:

> Too many of the protests against immigration restriction have been made by persons more interested in specific foreign groups or foreign nations than in the homogeneity of the United States.

According to another newspaper, it appears that foreign-language newspaper editors have organized to defeat the bill.

Not only nationals in the United States but foreign nations throughout the world are attempting to defeat this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CABLE. In a second.

According to the Columbus Dispatch of January 27, the Japanese Government has brought pressure to bear to defeat the legislation. The Columbus Dispatch says:

> Japs may cancel $200,000,000 in United States trade orders. • • • New York alien bloc ready.
> The pressure of foreign governments and alien blocs on administration leaders and Members of Congress will retard formation of the new immigration bill and may lead to radical changes, if not the defeat of the bill, in the opinion of some members of the committee.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand the Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, is opposed to this bill, and I just wanted to ask the gentleman if, in his opinion, such a propaganda as he refers to has had any effect on him in making up his mind in opposition to it?

Mr. CABLE. I respect the Secretary of State, but I can not agree with him on his proposition of admitting Japanese into the United States on a quota basis.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman think that the Secretary of State's opposition to this bill is going to retard its passage?

Mr. CABLE. I doubt it.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. KING. I want to know, for information, whether the gentleman in his work has discovered whether or not the shipping interests of New York City, and allied shipping interests, are opposed to the bill?

Mr. CABLE. I imagine they are, because the bill would cut down their revenue.

Mr. BOX. Is opposition to restriction and proper regulation of immigration not in line with their attitude throughout the entire history of the country's efforts to deal with the problem?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In answer to what effect statements in letters by Secretary Hughes might have on the bill, I wish to say that if the committee has time, it proposes to accept some of the administrative suggestions of the Secretary of State or amendments that might make the overseas immigration more workable. But as to the question of policy, the committee insists on the bill as it is reported, and will let the House vote up or down on the bill.

Mr. CABLE. I am glad to have the chairman make that statement.

Members of the committee, I want to call your attention to a clipping from Labor, a paper published in Washington, wherein it is stated:

> Foreign nations seek to write United States immigration law. Great pressure being brought on Congress to defeat Johnson restrictive measure. Large employers, foreign governments, and so-called alien blocs in this country have turned their batteries against the bill sponsored by ALBERT JOHNSON, Representative from Washington.

From the Times-Star of Cincinnati, Ohio, of February 10, 1924, I want to read this editorial statement to the members of the committee, and particularly to the gentleman from Chicago, Mr. SABATH:

> There is a foreign bloc in Washington, and it is at least as active as the other blocs. It is trying hard just now to prevent the enactment of any effective immigration legislation. On the other hand, feeling throughout the country is ten to one for restriction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, may I have one more minute?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if we could locate the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], the gentleman might have additional time. I have already yielded the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I will take the responsibility of yielding two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. CABLE. I thank the gentleman. I have a letter here from a lawyer—who is a naturalized citizen—in the city of Cleveland, Ohio, and I want to read the concluding paragraph of that letter:

> You and your "American" friends in the American Congress assembled should know and must know that, although some of us were born in foreign countries, we are not "foreigners" but loyal American citizens. We are with you in the "American bloc."

I want to commend that statement and the writer's patriotism. Many naturalized citizens are just as loyal as the native born. The mistake some make is that they attempt to use influence in the passage of legislation more in the interest of their native land than their adopted country. This immigration bill would not affect any foreign born here. I favor restrictive legislation. It will benefit all here alike, native and foreign born, alien and citizen.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. This is a selective immigration bill.

Mr. CABLE. Yes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Has not the gentleman found in his experience as a member of the Immigration Committee that there is a very substantial, a very large, sentiment in this country that is for the entire suspension of immigration for a period of five or ten years, and is not this bill, in a measure, a compromise with that sentiment?

Mr. CABLE. I will say to the gentleman that if the committee reported a suspension bill the House would pass it.

Mr. LINEBERGER. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. CABLE. This bill admits fireside relatives of American citizens outside the quota. It counts abroad instead of in New York. It will do away absolutely with the hardships of deportation as far as the quota provisions are concerned.

The national need for a further restrictive as well as selective measure is recognized in the bill. The changes proposed are not radical but necessary and may be summarized as follows:

The weaklings are weeded out abroad by means of a certificate plan and the granting to American consuls the discretion to refuse visés to those in their opinion undesirable. No families will be separated because of excess quotas, as no one can start without a certificate, which must be used within two months from the date of issue. It also prevents the racing of huge liners across the ocean to be the first to land their passengers. By means of this certificate plan a steady flow of foreign born through Ellis Island will be possible, resulting in a more thorough and more intensive examination.

The quota is reduced from 3 to 2 per cent, so that new arrivals may be limited to our capacity to absorb them. The census of 1890 instead of that of 1910 is proposed.

No discrimination against any country can be claimed, because fathers and mothers over 55 years of age, husbands and wives of citizens of the United States, as well as their unmarried minor children under 18 years of age, are admitted as nonquota immigrants, and such persons will come chiefly from countries whose quotas will be cut.

Those who are not eligible for citizenship are not admissible, because "we have no room in this land for those who can not assume the duties and obligations of citizenship."

A minimum quota of 200 is provided for every country. Seepage of alien seamen into the United States will be stopped by means of a landing-card provision. The proposed bill reduces the number who may come from 357,000 to 169,000.

The fight for further restrictive immigration is not as yet won. The bill is not a law. Alien influence, international in character, is joining forces with "alien blocs" in the United States to prevent the passage of this measure. In large cities where the foreign born hold the balance of power, threats of political punishment have already gone out to their Congressmen in case the measure is passed.

In addition, the work is not complete. Congress should continue the constructive program by adding to the quota the nationals of Mexico. A law should be passed penalizing the thousands of aliens who are smuggled into this country in defiance of our law. The only legal remedy now available is deportation, and that is seldom used because of lack of funds.

Enact a law placing the alien bootlegger in the class with the other deportable aliens. Permit the confiscation of airplanes, automobiles, and ships now used in the business of smuggling aliens into the United States. Establish patrols along the many unguarded highways leading into this country and at the same time conduct a thorough survey of our penal institutions to ascertain the undesirable alien and deport him.

Our Nation, neither economically nor socially, needs more immigrants, but it does need to make good citizens of aliens now here. This is best accomplished by the restrictive policy of this bill. America must be kept American.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the bloc which has been created by my friend and colleague from Ohio——

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. CABLE. I will say this: It was the foreign born who came here before the bill was reported out that opposed the organization of an American bloc to protect American principles and ideals under American laws. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. I venture to say that all of the gentlemen who came and appeared before the committee are just as loyal and just as law abiding as any voters or citizens in the gentleman's district, and you nor anyone else needs to fear that American principles and ideals are in any danger by anything that they have done or may do in the future.

What I desire to say is this: That the bloc is a creation in the suspicious mind of the gentleman who has given birth to the foreign bloc in the interview he gave out and in the statement he made here some time ago.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, you all, as well as myself, were very much amused when the gentleman from Ohio had the letter, purporting to come from some foreign born, addressed to the commissioner at Ellis Island, read. As you observed, it was signed "Citizen" and typewritten. Does not that appear a little suspicious? Of course, I would not even insinuate that my colleague would for a moment doubt that such letter had actually been written, but I do firmly believe that it was written—not by a foreign-born citizen—but by one of those busy professional restrictionists with a view of being utilized and, perhaps, even read by some one on the floor not only for political reasons but for the purpose of creating prejudice in the minds of the Members of the House, and this would not be unusual because at all times while immigration bills are being considered, statements, articles, yes, even statistics, are being manufactured to be utilized to mislead the American people against immigration.

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I have only five minutes.

Mr. CABLE. I have the original letter here which the commissioner gave me.

Mr. SABATH. I have only five minutes. Now, the gentleman from California, and, of course, as Californians feel the same way, they are continuously fearful and afraid of the future of our Nation. Well, I want to say to him——

Mr. LINEBERGER. I want to correct the gentleman. We are not afraid of anything, but we want to protect the Nation.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman should not be afraid of anything.

Mr. LINEBERGER. We are afraid of this bloc more than anything else.

Mr. SABATH. I assure the gentleman he does not need to lose any sleep or be afraid of this bloc, because there is no such thing in existence that I know of. I have been a member of this committee for 16 years; this is my seventeenth year, and if there were such a bloc I believe I would know about it; in this, I believe, even the gentleman from Ohio will agree that I hide nothing and usually say things as they are to the best of my ability.

Mr. CABLE. I will say to the House that the gentleman is a good member of the committee, but we do not usually vote the same way.

Mr. SABATH. No; we do not always agree, and that is because the gentleman does not really understand the fundamental principle involved in the great question. [Applause.]

I have believed, and I believe now——

Mr. CABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. In one second. I am of the firm opinion and belief that notwithstanding the frequent unjustified charges that are being made against immigration our country in no way has suffered from it, but, on the contrary, has been greatly benefited. It is not only the present-day immigration but the immigration of a hundred, eighty, sixty, and forty years ago was obliged and did perform the hardest and the most common work which helped to upbuild our country. It has been employed in the forests and in the fields, in the mines, in the shops and plants, and has in every way aided and assisted in developing the wealth of our Nation. Not only has the immigrant helped to create, but he materially aided in finding an outlet for our surpluses, which has made our country the envy of the world, not only rich and prosperous, but the best country to live in.

The so-called "new" immigrant beyond doubt has clearly proven and demonstrated his loyalty to our country, to our flag, and to our institutions, and it is manifestly unfair that not only he but those of foreign parentage should be condemned on the floor of the House by a certain few gentlemen who make it appear that they are undeserving or that the Nation, as is so often stated, is in imminent danger from them.

Of course, I had not expected that the gentleman from Ohio would deliver his immigration speech, so ably prepared, at this time. In the near future I am going to answer him and others at length. Then I will show the gentleman from Ohio and some of my colleagues from the South, as well as from the Pacific coast, that they unnecessarily fret and that they are in error when they try to make the Nation believe that the newer immigration is inferior to the older immigration, and I will not only go back to the immigration of the eighties and sixties but for their information I will read statements and reports made by men who, like they, looked with apprehension to the then coming immigration, and I know that the Members and the country will be amused when they read the unkind things that were said of the immigrants who were charged with overrunning our cities and filling our penal institutions in 1670. And when opportunity presents itself I shall also read some of the reports about the immigrants who were coming in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries. Not with the intention, of course, to reflect upon them or the splendid citizenship of our country but merely to bring to the attention of the House and the country how some gentlemen even in those early years have been carried away with prejudice as some are to-day, and that the praise given to the earlier immigration was not forthcoming then, and for that purpose alone I insert, having the opportunity to extend my remarks, an extract from pages 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the second annual report of the managers of the Society for the Prevention of Pauperism, dated New York City, December, 1819:

First. As to emigrations from foreign countries, the managers are compelled to speak of them in the language of astonishment and apprehension. This inlet of pauperism threatens us with the most overwhelming consequences.

And this in the report of 1819, over 100 years ago:

The present state of Europe contributes in a thousand ways to vast and unceasing emigration to the United States. A universal shock of commercial embarrassment has pervaded, and still pervades the continent of Europe. The whole system of trade and exchange is affected; internal industry directed to new objects; nations are manufacturing for themselves, and abandoning the usual resorts; armies and navies are disbanded and labor-saving machinery is daily lessening the necessity of manual industry. Hence an almost innumerable population beyond the ocean is cast out of employment, and this has the effect of increasing the usual want of employ. This country is the resort of vast numbers of these needy and wretched beings. Thousands are continually resting their hopes on the refuge which she offers, filled with the delusive visions of plenty and luxury. They seize the earliest opportunity to cross the Atlantic and land upon our shores. Many arrive here destitute of everything. When they do arrive, instead of seeking the interior, they cluster in our cities, or sojourn along our seaboard, depending on the incidents of time, charity, or depredation, for subsistence.

And this in the report, 1819:

On application by one of the managers to his honor the mayor, he states that from the 1st day of March, 1818, to the 1st day of November, 1819, there have been 35,560 passengers who have arrived in vessels at the city of New York, and been reported at his office, of these, 18,930 are foreigners. How many others have crossed our frontier lines, and arrived by way of the Canadas, or how many thousands have evaded our laws, which requires a report of each person on landing, we can not say, but the chief magistrate of this city has calculated that the number of 18,000 and upward, does not include more than two-thirds of the real number; and after making every reasonable deduction, this would give as an aggregate of more than 28,000 who have arrived at this port in 20 months. What has been the destination of this immense accession of population, and where is it now? Many of these foreigners may have found employment; some may have passed into the interior; but thousands still remain among us. They are frequently found destitute in our streets; they seek employment at our doors; they are found in our almshouse and in our hospitals; they are found at the bar of our criminal tribunals, in our bridewell, our penitentiary, and our State prison. And we lament to say that they are too often led by want, by vice, and by habit, to form a phalanx of plunder and depredation, rendering our city more liable to the increase of crimes, and our houses of correction more crowded with convicts and felons. For years and generations will Europe continue to send forth her surplus population. The winds and the waves will still bring needy thousands to our seaports, and this city continue the general point of arrival. Over this subject can we longer slumber? Shall we behold a moral contagion spreading and expanding with the most inveterate ravages amid the ranks of our growing population, without endeavoring to arrest its progress? Shall this mass suddenly be identified with ourselves and our children, inculcating their habits and their principles, without an anxious effort on our part to stay the impending calamity?

And this is a part of report made in the year 1819!

Mr. Chairman, all I want, or, rather, will say to you to-day is this: You ought not to accuse Secretary Hughes because he has sent in the letter or report pointing out the defects in the bill. He was obliged to do that, and any honest Secretary would be obliged to do the same thing. He pointed out in his report that the bill is violative of our treaties with foreign governments, and there is no question about that. He pointed out that it is a dicriminatory bill, and there is no question about that.

I hope in the near future, when you gentlemen who are sane on the question of immigration will read unbiased reports, you will come to the conclusion that he was right and that the bill that was reported by the committee was discriminatory and violative of our treaties with the foreign governments.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Can I have two more minutes?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNERY. Does not my colleague from Illinois know that the President of the United States told a delegation which came here to visit him, as quoted in the newspapers a few days ago, that he was against any bill which would discriminate against any nation in particular, and does not this bill discriminate particularly against southern Europe in contradistinction to northern Europe?

Mr. SABATH. So I have been informed, but, as I have stated, the bill does discriminate against the so-called newer immigration, because it is based on the census of 1890 instead of 1920; and that is done for the purpose, as I say, of keeping out as many of the newer immigrants, or people of that kind of immigration which has been designated as the newer immigration. In connection with that I want to say to you that the records will clearly demonstrate that there is no danger or need of fear from the newer immigration. They have demonstrated their loyalty and patriotism to the same extent that the older immigration has.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. But, of course, the advocates of restriction, and especially those who believe there should be no immigration, must have something, and consequently they send out from day to day statements, interviews, and misleading articles to prejudice the minds of the American people against the so-called newer immigration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LINEBERGER. May the gentleman have another minute? I want to ask him a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. LINEBERGER. The gentleman said the 1890 bill discriminates against the so-called newer immigration.

Mr. SABATH. Yes, sir.

Mr. LINEBERGER. If that is true, would not the 1910 basis, which I understand the gentleman is in favor of, discriminate against the older immigration?

Mr. SABATH. No; it would not.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Who were the original American stock.

Mr. SABATH. What do you call the original stock?

Mr. LINEBERGER. From northwestern Europe.

Mr. SABATH. No; it would not. It would give them the same percentage; in fact, it would give them a larger number of immigrants than the 1890, and there would be no discrimination.

Mr. LINEBERGER. There would be a discrimination in ratio, however, if 1910 is adopted instead of 1890.

Mr. SABATH. No.

Mr. HOLADAY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SABATH. Can I have three more minutes to answer some of these questions?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. SABATH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HOLADAY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not believe that these alien groups, organized as a particular alien group, appearing before the committee and putting out propaganda in behalf of their native land against the action of the American Congress, are doing more to stir up prejudice against them than anything else?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I do agree with the gentleman that some of these overanxious gentlemen coming down here and pleading for fair play and against discrimination creates a prejudice, but it should not, because they are sincere and honest men. They are well-meaning men. They do not mean to do any harm; but they do not realize that you gentlemen look upon them with suspicion and believe they are undeserving of being permitted to appear before the Committee on Immigration or any other committee and state their grievance. That is their right and privilege, and you should not resent it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. SABATH was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.]

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a bill which will carry on some of the restrictive provisions of the present quota law, which would expire on June 30, must be passed soon through this body and through the Senate. It must be apparent to all Members and citizens generally that as the weeks go by, bringing us closer to the time when such a restrictive law, which was the first one ever signed by any President, expires, that the issue will become more and more keen.

Nothing breeds so much trouble as racial differences. There is nothing which makes such vicious debate as religious prejudice. Therefore if the membership of this House which desires to act for the good of the United States will, as these debates come on and as letters and telegrams pour in, and as the issue becomes more and more clear cut, begin to sort up and classify the varying forms of opposition and endeavor to see why this kind of opposition and why that kind of opposition and how all opposition is bound together, we shall be prepared to exercise good judgment when the time comes to vote on the restrictive immigration bill.

I believe now more firmly than ever that races will stick together. There must be some reason. In Europe, where there is so much trouble, often when you cross a river you step from one nation to another nation. You find the people not only speaking a different language but hating the people on the other side of the river with all their might, as they have hated them for a thousand years; and, to my mind, as we come in the United States to a reflex of these disturbances in connection with an effort to restrict immigration, and when we hear the appeals of various peoples calling themselves this or that hyphenated type of American, we can see what we are breeding in the United States if we do not act now while the opportunity is ours. [Applause.]

There is no malice and there is no attempt at discrimination and no hatred in the bill which is on the calendar (H. R. 7995). A situation has arisen and that bill meets it. I have taken occasion in years past to say to those who come with special appeals in behalf of special peoples who seem to think that because they have arrived in the United States the people they left behind in other countries have vested rights in the United States, that each time the House Committee on Immigration labors on and the challenge becomes more bitter, I feel sure that the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman will, if it makes any change in the bill at all, make it still more restrictive. [Applause.] Many Members of the House want a bill completely suspending immigration.

But, my friends, when you come to write a bill suspending immigration you find you can not write one unless you suspend the treaties with all nations. So you have to make exemptions to cover the requirements of all the treaties, and then make exemptions for visitors, for sailors, for wives and children, and soon you make so many exemptions that you destroy the plan of suspension. A small quota is the better plan.

I am only one member of the committee and only one Member of this great House, but if I could write a bill I would restrict the quota almost to the vanishing point, and then I would admit the bona fide wives and children—the unmarried children under 18 of the people in the country prior to April 1, 1924, or any other date certain. In that way we could clean house and help those now here to establish their homes. To my mind there is nothing gained in bringing new people, new immigrants, without their wives and children, and then denying them the opportunity or privilege of bringing their actual immediate families. I hope some day that those who are working the hardest to solve the immigration question will see that.

The preamble to our Constitution starts with "We, the people of the United States." That takes care of all the people here. We do not say "citizens," but we say "people," and we mean "people." That being so, the quicker we decide to be a little more careful as to who are admitted as "people of the United States" the more certain we shall be as to the future of the United States. If we continue to admit great numbers of those who fail to assimilate, we will be in danger of ourselves being assimilated. Our customs will be changed for us. Indeed, that very thing is happening in many localities. Entire political subdivisions have become so beholden to the views of the new arrivals—even of those who do not vote—that a rational consideration of the immigration problem is out of the question. When we read the authentic and official reports as to the great numbers of those who are trying to get to the United States from central Europe, we should realize that the quicker we shut down immigration to the vanishing point the better off we will be. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the people here should know something about the proposition of Mussolini, of Italy, for the establishment of a new kind of Italian savings bank in this country for the benefit of the people in Italy. The people in the United States should know why the Italian wives and children do not come here.

Let us try to pass a law which will be for the good of the United States to-day, to-morrow, and for all time, and let us do it without malice, without regard to the threats to sabotage any political party. If we do not do it no political party, either Democratic or Republican, will be safe from similar attack. In New York City to-day to elect men to high places you put up one man with a foreign name naturalized on one ticket and another man with a foreign name on the other ticket, and you call such candidates Republican or Democrat as best fits the situation. No good can come of such low politics. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if every once in a while we could get from some foreign government an immigrant from the many thousands who come to this country, a citizen who would become as good a citizen and as valuable and honorable a citizen as our distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], there might be some excuse for opening wide the doors and having no restrictions. He is a valuable citizen. Some of his colleagues may not know it, but last year from his farm he raised over 100,000 baskets of potatoes to help feed this Nation. [Applause.] Last year from his farm he raised nearly 150,000 baskets of onions to help feed the Nation. I approve of such a citizen as Brother SABATH, but I believe, as our friend from Ohio [Mr. CABLE] said, that if the question was put fairly up to this House, not by a compromise bill from this committee, but put fairly and squarely before the House to protect the rights of just such citizens as the gentleman from Illinois, I believe the House would pass a bill to suspend immigration for at least five years in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I wish to state that there are hundreds of thousands much better men and much more deserving men, who came the same way I did, right in the United States than I am.

Mr. BLANTON. Where you get one good citizen like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] we get thousands of anarchistic Bolshevists who would tear down and destroy the Government of the United States.

Now, I can not pass on without referring to the splendid speech delivered by our colleague from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] this morning. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] and myself differ on a great many subjects. We have voted against each other on a great many occasions. He does not agree with me many times, and he has fought against me across this aisle on numerous occasions. But I have learned to love him since I have been in the House. I do not know a braver man in this House than our distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. There is not a more loyal citizen, there is not a more patriotic citizen, who stands here day after day fighting for the best interests of the Nation. I appreciate a man like that, even when I sometimes differ with him, and I say God speed him in the splendid work he is doing.

But I must get down to the bill we now have under discussion.

Mr. Chairman, the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia have given their promise to Congress that if we will pass this salary bill granting them adequate compensation they will furnish Washington, the Nation's Capital, with the most up-to-date, efficient, law-enforcing police force in the United States. If they will do this, it will be money well spent. I am in favor of giving them a trial.

We have been told that present salaries do not attract enough men of high character and necessary qualifications to fill the ranks, but that with the increases granted by this bill eliminations may be made of any members of the force who may be inefficient, unqualified, or careless in law enforcement and the personnel brought up to 100 per cent good.

There are some men on this force who are careless, for on their beats exists dives where the law is daily violated. I have had occasion to check up on them where complaints came to me from citizens. I know of one such place where it is reliably reported that the proprietor has been arrested three times, and immediately after releasing himself by giving a small bond has resumed his business of selling liquor that intoxicates, with a crowd of young men hanging around his establishment each afternoon and night, notwithstanding that I personally brought these complaints to the attention of the superintendent and inspector. A vigilant police should be able to put such a lawbreaker out of business by arresting him every time he opened up.

It has become so dangerous to walk across the streets of Washington that every time you start across the street one of these taxicabs that operate here now is liable to run over you. There is no attempt whatever made in the city of Washington to regulate the speed, especially of these black and white taxicabs. All of them are bad enough. I want you colleagues of mine to watch them every time you go out on the streets of Washington and you will see that they are darting here and there, driving all the way at from 25 miles to 40 miles per hour in certain parts of the city with little children out in the streets.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is not the reason they paint them black and white so that you can see them? You could hardly see them if they were not so painted, they go so fast.

Mr. BLANTON. The law that regulates speeding is just as applicable to the black and white taxicabs and to every other kind of taxicab as it is to every other kind of an automobile that runs in the city. I say that the policemen of the city of Washington must stop it. They are winking at those taxicab companies. They are granting them immunities and special privileges. They are letting them violate the law every day for some reason, I know not what, and they ought to enforce the law as to them as well as to individuals.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. KING. I wonder if the gentleman has made any investigation of the monopoly of the standing space in front of the Union Station by the black and white taxicabs.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I have mentioned that on the floor a dozen times. Even a Representative or Senator in his own car can not drive into the Union Station without going in a side way. The main passage there next to the station is reserved exclusively for the black and white taxicabs. If a man goes there in his own car, he has to go into the second or third or fourth driveway, and then walk in between privileged taxicabs to get into the station. He can not go into the main driveway, because that is reserved for the black and white taxicabs. Nor can any other taxi enter there. The President's car itself would not be permitted to drive in there, because the black and white taxicab has a monopoly there which it enjoys; and these busses do not observe the traffic rules and pay no attention to the rights of individuals. The police force must enforce the laws. Unless, Mr. Chairman, the Metropolitan police force does clean up and does eliminate the careless, indifferent, and inefficient policemen and force every policeman to be active on his beat and promptly suppress all violations, I am going to be the first Member of Congress to introduce a bill to abolish the salary of the superintendent and to cut in half the salary of every policeman in Washington. This must be made the model police force in the Nation. It must set the pace in law enforcement. It must lead, so that all other forces may follow. If I did not have confidence in these men and did not believe they would do this and make good, I would not support this bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, believing that this bill will pass without opposition, I desire to use my time in discussing another matter that may soon come before us.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I suggest that the gentleman try the other alternative and double the salaries of the policemen and he might find a more effective force.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we are giving a very substantial raise of all salaries in this bill. That is what I have been discussing. We are doing that with the hope that they will make their promise good and make the police force here the best in the Nation. We are giving them all substantial raises, from the superintendent down to the lowest grade of policemen on the force.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. How does the gentleman expect the police of Washington to keep order under the worst-lighted street system of any city of its size in the United States?

Mr. BLANTON. That is a matter which we will take up on another occasion. I want now to discuss the garden-seed ghost.

GARDEN-SEED GHOST.

Mr. Chairman, on January 3, 1923, a motion was made to recommit the Agriculture appropriation bill in order to add to same $360,000 for free garden seed. I made a point of order against it. The Speaker sustained the point of order. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] appealed from the decision of the Chair, and by a vote of 173 to 85 the membership of the House sustained the Speaker in his decision, which prevented this $360,000 garden-seed item from going in the bill. This stopped free garden seed.

Early in December the press reported that in this Congress the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] would introduce his bill to make this $360,000 garden-seed appropriation permanent law, appropriated annually. Shortly after this the newspapers all over Texas began publishing notices about this Langley garden-seed bill.

And after the people became apprised of the fact that some Members of Congress had in contemplation the resumption of the practice of permitting Congressmen and Senators to mail out to the people under their franks $360,000 worth of free garden seed, I want to read to you colleagues some of the protests against same which I have received.

WHAT THE PEOPLE AT HOME THINK.

Here is a protest I received from one part of Jones County:

LUEDERS, TEX., December 17, 1923.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR TOM: We have noticed in the public press that there is to come before the House a bill to try to start again the garden-seed graft and thus increase taxes on the people. We, the undersigned citizens in your district, ask that you do all in your power to prevent its passage, as we feel that we have all the expenses in the way of taxation that we are able to bear. We ask that you do all you can to get your worthy colleagues to defeat it:

I. Z. Brown, M. D.; Berry M. Campbell, druggist; M. G. George, farmer; S. W. Seaman, oil driller; J. A. Wilbite, merchant; C. A. Douthit, ginner; W. F. Terry, restaurant; N. J. Tosh, druggist; Mrs. M. J. Brown, gardener; J. N. Loop, farmer; J. H. Lee, bookkeeper; Charles Stifflemire, banker; B. U. Fox, merchant; H. L. Brown, restaurant; B. E. Compton, farmer; Frank H. Herrick, editor; J. E. Powell, teacher; Charles Webb, clerk; J. J. Gentry, pastor Baptist church; T. R. Putnam, merchant; Ray Rushing, farmer; Albert Hansen, clerk; W. C. Smart, farmer; H. E. Herrick, merchant; T. M. Smart, druggist; R. Dunlap, M. D.; E. L. Loudder, M. D.; J. R. Carrell, merchant; Mrs. T. M. Smart, clerk; G. W. Price, farmer; W. C. Herrington, farmer; Oscar F. Seth, farmer; T. F. Murry, restaurant; O. B. Cotton, clerk; G. F. Vaughn, shoe maker; A. Fitzgerald, merchant; C. G. Covery, farmer; R. J. Fickel, machinist; Mrs. Sarah Sharbutt; R. W. Harper.

The above list fairly represents the citizenship of this splendid community. The following comes from San Saba County:

SAN SABA, TEX., December 22, 1923.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am herewith inclosing you a protest against the reenactment of the free garden seed bill.

This protest is signed by the very best element of citizenship of this county, representing nearly every avocation. Nearly every man, woman, and child here would sign this protest eagerly. The spirit an expression of the people are against this foolish proposition. This extravagant expenditure of the people's money is a mock pretense of Congress to do benefit to the people of the country. A majority of us are strictly against this measure and hope that it will be defeated.

With best wishes and kind regards, I am,

Yours truly,

W. C. EDWARDS.

PETITION.

SAN SABA, TEX., December 19, 1923.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There has recently appeared in press reports a strong intimation that the "free garden seed" act would at this session of Congress be attempted to be reenacted.

We the undersigned wish to protest against this useless bill because in our opinion the benefits are not commensurate with the expenditures.

Respectfully,

W. C. Edwards, ranchman; S. J. Bross, county surveyor; C. A. Harkey, county treasurer; George W. Horton, secretary chamber of commerce; G. L. Huckaby, county school superintendent; A. B. Wilson, county attorney; W. A. Smith, editor the News; W. V. Dean, county judge; Edgar T. Neal, sheriff of county; E. L. Rector, ex-State senator; T. A. Murray, president City National Bank; Mrs. Eddie Williams, clerk district court; J. K. Rector, attorney; Mitch Johnson, attorney; Dr. Ira O. Stone; Dr. J. L. Dailey; Dr. William S. Bickham; Leonard A. Skaggs, druggist; W. A. Ashley, ranchman; J. E. Rainey, farmer; T. J. Burnham, farmer; W. H. Kimbrough, merchant; James W. Cummins, merchant; W. G. Jarvis, optometrist; G. A. Walters, jr., abstractor; H. B. Clark, clerk; W. R. Hines, merchant; B. D. Sullivan, merchant; O. L. Gray, ranchman; W. L. White, clerk; H. D. Chadwick, clerk; Rev. E. E. Giesler; C. B. Lambert, farmer; W. W. Whitley, ranchman; R. Terry, farmer; Arch Woods, clerk county court.

I think that includes every officer in that county.

I have a protest sent me by Mr. E. C. Brand, of Hamlin, Tex., in which he says:

I hope to see the day when Congress will be filled with men who will try to preserve the finances of our country as they do their own, or, in other words, before they spend a dollar of the people's money, ask themselves the question, if the dollar belonged to them in person, would they expend it in such a manner.

With reference to this garden seed, we think that it is money thrown away. For instance, in talking with three men in my office yesterday two of them told me that they had received garden seed from the Government and they were stored away unused. The writer in a clean-up at home two or three days ago ran across several packages. I sincerely hope that if this seed graft bill comes up again you will use every effort to defeat it. Attached you will find a petition signed by a few of our leading citizens who ask that you protest against this graft. I believe that 90 per cent of the farmers in your district are against it.

PETITION.

HAMLIN, TEX., December 18, 1923.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We the undersigned farmers and business men petition that you use every effort to defeat the garden seed bill, as we believe that it is a waste to the taxpayer. We think that it is a useless expenditure and doubt that over one-third of the seed are ever planted. Your efforts will be appreciated.

T. F. Holman, C. S. Low, E. C. Brand, Lewis Boyd, W. R. Townsend, J. A. Feagan, J. C. Bledsoe, O. H. Berry, D. M. Poe, J. B. Eakin, Fred Sledge, G. L. Barnett, H. M. Payne, W. L. Hunter, D. O. Sauls, Lennie Greenway, G. H. Tumlin, R. G. Bowdry, Pat Henry, S. C. Ferguson, J. P. Terrill, H. Fields, Dr. J. F. Taylor, T. Cooper, W. M. Hinton.

The following, Mr. Chairman, was received from Taylor County:

To the Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

We, the undersigned citizens and qualified voters of Taylor County, Tex., respectfully ask that you exert every legitimate effort in opposing the free-seed bill when it comes up in Congress

G. T. Robinson, B. W. Ellison, F. A. Walden, R. L. Shepard, W. R. Gilbreth, B. T. Chrane, M. C. Rampy, J. H. Kading, R. E. Longacre, A. B. Lewis, C. E. Taylor, J. R. Hardwick, W. C. Davis, J. E. I received the following protest from Mr. R. E. Bradbury, editor of the Lometa Reporter, and who formerly edited the Mullin Enterprise:

[From the Lometa Reporter]

LOMETA, TEX., December 19, 1923.

Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: From press reports we learn that Congress will soon take up for consideration the measure to appropriate an exceedingly large sum in order that the people might be supplied with a few free garden seeds, a practice that is considered very foolish by most every person receiving them. From a sensible and economical standpoint we hope the measure will be defeated this time as it was during the last session. It is a needless waste and we feel confident that you will fight it to a cold finish. Multitudes of others are of the same opinion.

I have talked to hundreds of people living in Brown, Mills, and Lampasas Counties about this waste and not one appreciates the seeds that are usually sent out, and the Congressmen who fosters such a proposition is surely to be pitied.

Find a better use for the people's money than buying a few packages of garden seeds that, if planted, will never come up.

Wishing you and family a merry Christmas and a happy New Year, and may you live to give a century more of service in Congress.

I am, yours sincerely,

R. E. BRADBURY.

The following protest was sent me by one of the leading citizens of Anson, Tex.:

ANSON, TEX., December 15, 1923.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of Jones County, Tex., learning that there will be an attempt made to again pass a bill or get an appropriation for the distribution of garden seed, do hereby protest against such action on the part of Congress, and call upon you to defeat same if possible.

We understand that this matter costs the Government about a half a million dollars annually, or something near that sum, and by itself it probably would not affect to any great extent the vast number of taxpayers in the United States, yet it is one item among many items of the kind which is useless, and when taken together with all such items in the aggregate constitutes a big sum, which eliminated from the annual appropriation bills would relieve the taxpayers of this country. Besides it is not good policy or good morals to waste the public money for any purpose, and we hereby call upon you to use your best endeavors to defeat such a bill.

The following protest was sent me by one of the leading citizens of Bradshaw, Tex.:

BRADSHAW, TEX., January 5, 1924.

To the honorable body of Representatives of the Sixty-eighth Congress of the United States:

We do hereby petition you as follows:

"From press reports some Members of Congress are again organizing their forces to pass at this Congress their $360,000 garden seed graft bill, which was defeated last year. These seeds are practically worthless, and a great expense is attached to sending them out. We must curtail expenses if we desire a tax reduction. If this $360,000 is expended annually for these seed, there must necessarily be collected a like amount in taxes from the people to pay the bill. Therefore we, the undersigned citizens and taxpayers of this town, do hereby enter our protest against this bill and petition you to defeat it, as it is a useless expenditure—one that is sapping the American taxpayer's pocketbook."

SANTA ANNA, TEX., December 22, 1923.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: From recent press dispatches we note that there will be an effort made to reestablish the old custom of spending about one-half million dollars of the Government money so that each and every Congressman may send to Bill Jones or Sy Smith free garden seed.

From my own personal experience and that of many hundreds of your constituents with whom I have talked, we believe this to be a wasteful expenditure of money and should not be permitted. We further believe that if Congress would assist to cut out entirely and cut down immensely, particularly in the number of unnecessary Government employees, that it would be unnecessary for the Government to assess the present high tax rate, for by your plan you are cutting down expenses and when you do that you make it unnecessary for so much income.

Please let me have a personal letter from you concerning your campaign for Congress in your old district next year, if you have decided to make the race again. If you do decide to run again, I am for you, as always in the past, even though we do have an avowed candidate here in my own county, who is my neighbor and friend.

Very truly yours,

T. RICHARD SEALY.

I received the following protest from one of the leading merchants and business men of Brown County:

BROWNWOOD, TEX., December 21, 1923.

MR. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I have been noticing for several years the comments of the press on the practice of Congressmen distributing garden seed over the country. I consider this an absolute waste of the people's money, and am writing you to ask that you register a protest against this for the people.

There may be some short-sighted people who receive these seed thinking they have gotten something for nothing, who are pleased with this pork-barrel system of trying to get votes, but any man with brains enough to think knows that these seeds cost more than if raised by private individuals or corporations, and each individual certainly should select the seeds needed in his garden to a better advantage and to his liking than his Congressman could possibly do. Besides, seed shipped over the country by freight is certainly a more economical way of distributing than to dribble them out through the mails. I assure you that there are very few people ignorant enough in these enlightened times to think this wasteful system does not cost them anything.

I believe that it is the duty of the people in charge of our affairs to put a stop to this awful humbug business.

I am inclosing the names of several of my friends who join me in this protest, and I will say to you frankly that not a single individual approached on this subject has favored the continuance of Congressmen dishing out garden seed.

Yours truly,

W. G. BAXTER.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. I just want to ask if those petitioners to whom the gentleman has referred are his constituents?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; every one of them; but I have a whole bunch of others in my office, among which are some from the constituents of other Congressmen.

Mr. ALLEN. Did the gentleman send those constituents seed?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I have done it in the past, before we stopped the practice last year.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not that indicate very strongly that the people to whom the seed was sent are not garden men, they are not farmers, but they are officers, as the gentleman suggested?

Mr. BLANTON. If my friend will read their names in the RECORD to-morrow morning, he will see that many of them sign their names as farmers.

Mr. ALLEN. But doctors seldom use seed.

Mr. BLANTON. Sometimes they do. I can not yield further. I did not attempt in my time to read their vocations, but the vocations of many of these petitioners are stated opposite their names, and the gentleman can see that a great percentage of them are farmers.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the gentleman said that they were all officers of a county.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I merely said that one list embraced every officer of San Saba County. But it likewise embraced men of all vocations. Here is one sent me by one of the leading merchants of Brown County.

Mr. KING. What is his business?

Mr. BLANTON. He is a general merchant.

Mr. LILLY. He sells seed?

Mr. BLANTON. He may; I do not know. Here is the petition:

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of Brownwood, Tex., ask that you please do all in your power to stop the wasteful practice of distributing garden seed over the country at the expense of the people. We do not believe that the people receive benefits to justify the amounts expended by this practice.

Kelly, J. L. Lane, Geo. Gardenhire, Mrs. B. F. Anthony, Mrs. B. H. Baxter, H. F. Hunter, Mrs. H. F. Hunter, J. F. Hunter.

The following protest was sent to me by Mr. C. T. Beckham, one of the leading farmers and citizens of Trent, Tex.:

TRENT, TEX., December 15, 1923.

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We notice from the press dispatches that Congress may soon again be called on to pass appropriations for the distribution of garden seeds, etc.

May we, as citizens of the country, be permitted to express our disapproval of all these unnecessary expenditures and to respectfully suggest to you that you use your utmost influence against the passage of such bills. We know from our own experience and observation that the money spent for seeds is largely wasted, as the garden seed from the post office is a huge joke with many of us. Assuring you that we appreciate your efforts in your endeavor to eliminate all such expenses of the Government, we are,

Very respectfully,

L. E. Adrian, C. T. Beckham, Jas. Bright, J. K. P. Winn, A. Williamson, T. J. Williamson, H. W. Beckham, H. M. Scott, O. L. Dowchy, M. G. Scott, J. O. Walter, Mrs. Billings, R. B. Johnson, Joe Winter, W. F. Steadman, W. J. Armour, J. S. Reid, E. Kegans, Carl Edwards, Ross Campbell, L. Z. Petsworth, C. Murdock, J. S. Campbell, Jackson Bright, Isaac Bright, C. Whitfield, J. M. The following was sent to me by Mr. M. W. Oldham, one of the leading farmers of Avoca, Tex.:

AVOCA, TEX., December 22, 1923.

Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE: As farmers and voters we appeal to you as our Representative to oppose the garden seed bill. We understand that it is to come up before Congress again soon. We oppose any such law, because we consider it of no value whatever.

These seed that are sent out by the Government to all parts of the United States are of no benefit to us, because our climate and soil do not suit these seeds sent out.

We, as taxpayers, do not think it right to spend money for this, which is of no benefit to us.

We appeal to the United States Congress to oppose any such law or matter that comes before you.

We earnestly ask that this matter be considered seriously.

Yours truly,

M. W. OLDHAM.
N. B. OLDHAM.
J. H. EVETTS.
P. H. GIFFORD.
JOHN GIFFORD.
W. W. FARMER.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I could put in the RECORD a whole bunch more but that would take me another hour to read them, and I do not want to encumber the RECORD in that way. But I wanted you to know about these expressions from the people. If you get the pulse of your own constituents, if you could hear what they say about these free garden seeds when they take them from the post office, you would find that the great majority of the people of this country think that it is humbug practice that has well been stopped. I am glad that the Congress stopped it in the last session, and I hope that the Congress will not go back to it again. Let us give our constituents something else beside garden-seed service. You remember our former colleague, one of the most distinguished gentlemen in the House, the former gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Candler. You will all recall that he made so many speeches in favor of free garden seed that some of us got to calling him the garden-seed Congressman. Did the sending out of those garden seed keep him in Congress? Not at all. Neither will it keep any of you gentlemen in Congress. It is a liability instead of an asset. It makes the business men and the farmers of your community lose confidence in the work that we should do here when we take up the time of our office to mail out a lot of 5-cent packages of garden seed, each one of which costs this Government more than 25 cents by the time they reach our particular constituents. It is a practice that should have been stopped long before Congress did stop it. It is a practice that I believe Congress will not again inaugurate.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirteen minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LINEBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I want to say to the gentleman that I come from a district where there is no greater opportunity for trucking and farming and gardening afforded in any other part of the country, and the people there are absolutely disgusted with this free-seed distribution. Two-thirds of the seeds sent out by the former Congressman, before I came here, lay in the post offices and was eaten up by the rats. It cost a thousand dollars a day. I just wanted to indorse everything the gentleman from Texas said, but the gentleman did not want to give me an opportunity to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say that the gentleman from California knows that I would not knowingly show him any discourtesy. I have the highest regard for him and we are good friends. I want to point him out to my colleagues as the kind of product that we in Texas raise—the very distinguished gentleman from California—as Texas sent him to California, and we are still proud of him.

Mr. LINEBERGER. No; I was born in Tennessee.

Mr. BLANTON. But we gave the gentleman a good education down there in Texas at a good Baptist college.

Mr. LINEBERGER. I am very proud of my sojourn in Texas, but I spent only two years in Texas, one in school. I thank the gentleman for the compliment, and I am sorry I do not merit all he says.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas use the balance of his time? We have only one speech over here?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I really feel like not using the time allotted to me. I intended to talk along the line which was so fully covered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. However, I wish to add, if I may, just one or two suggestions to the most excellent speech which he made. We have here a most splendid city. It is a beautiful city to live in. It is the Nation's Capital, and I regret very much that there is so much violation of law here in the Nation's Capital. I regret very much that the newspapers speak so flippantly of the violation of law. I saw in a paper not long ago where some man who drove a high-powered car was pointed out by a prominent official as being one of the great bootleggers in the Nation's Capital. The newspapers carried an article about this bootlegger, as though it were a great honor to be a bootlegger here in the Nation's Capital.

We ought to enforce the law in Washington. We ought to enforce the prohibition laws. But that subject has been so fully covered that I want to talk just a little about the enforcement of the law against the autoists who speed here in the city of Washington. I believe our good friend Mr. BLANTON made a suggestion that there ought to be, possibly, a secret service corps of enforcement officers. That is true. If you get on a street car here at the Capitol and go out on the Mount Pleasant line I venture the assertion that you will see at least two or three men in that distance risking their lives by driving in front of the street car, forcing the man who drives that street car to slow down in order to save the life of the driver. The man who endangers his own life by driving in front of a speeding street car and forcing the motorman of that street car to slow down to save the life of the autoist will endanger by speeding your life and the lives of your wife and children.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. KING. I wonder if in the gentleman's investigation he has noticed the activity with which a man who drives a car seeks to run down those people who are crossing the white lines. I think it is a safer plan to keep out of the white lines rather than walk within the white lines. I understand also that Mr. Commissioner Oyster talks about removing the wooden platforms along the street-car tracks. Those are the last hope of the downtrodden pedestrian.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman think the white lines help the people to see better?

Mr. LANKFORD. I can not say as to that. I notice that Mr. Oyster proposes to take off the speed limit as well as take away the wooden platforms. We need here an appropriation for officers dressed in plain clothes to go throughout the city and when they find a man violating the street ordinance arrest that man then and there and bring him into court and try him. Consider the low amount of the fines that are imposed here in the District of Columbia for violation of the speed law—$1, $2, or $3. The ordinary man arrested for exceeding the speed limit is not fined enough. There ought to be a heavy fine put on the man who goes out and violates the law here, endangering the lives of men, women, and children. You pick up a newspaper in the morning and you see where a child is crushed by an automobile and is taken to the hospital, and then they wait to see if the child dies before they arrest the driver of the automobile that injured him, or the driver is let out on bail, and then an inquest is held and it is proven that the child walked in front of the automobile and the driver is released. Should the child have been crawling or running? It is a joke the way the speed ordinance is enforced here in the District of Columbia. The other day a poor woman was knocked down by an automobile in front of the House Office Building and dragged an entire square and since died.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. And the driver did not stop——

Mr. LANKFORD. No; the automobile did not stop. If the driver had been arrested, he would have probably been turned loose on his plea that the poor woman walked in front of the car. I do not suppose she flew there.

Officials in the District of Columbia who are charged with the enforcement of rules and regulations against speeding seem to accept as a good defense the fact that a child or a grown person walked in front of a speeding automobile and was hit. It is impossible to cross the street without walking in front of not one car only but dozens of cars. The fact that the man driving the car is doing so carelessly or at a high rate of speed and hits an individual either standing, walking, or running does not relieve the auto driver from full responsibility. The great trouble is that thousands of automobile drivers put the burden on other people to dodge them. They force the motormen of street cars to slow down in order to protect them. They force other drivers who are careful to slow down or change the course of their cars in order to protect them. These same careless, and in most cases extremely criminal, drivers also put the burden on the pedestrian to dodge and run for their lives.

Stand on one of our street corners for only a few minutes and watch and you will soon see drivers of automobiles hurrying along, turning corners, and looking not ahead but either back or in some direction other than where the car is going. They look enough to see that they are not driving their car into a tree, a brick wall, or a steam shovel, or some larger automobile, then they speed up their car, force the drivers of street cars to slow down to protect them. They force the drivers of smaller automobiles to dodge them and force pedestrians to run for their lives. If the pedestrian is hit he is accused of the awful crime of being on foot, walking on the street in front of the car at the time he was hit. This seems to make an absolute defense unless the newspapers report inaccurately the defenses which are sustained in cases where people are killed by automobiles driven at reckless speed or in a criminally negligent manner. It seems to make no difference how criminal the driver of the car is provided the party who was hit was walking in front of the car when he was hit, or got in front of the car by walking.

Under this same theory of defense, if a man takes a pistol and discharges it down a crowded street—it matters not how criminal his act may be—if he happened to hit some one who happened to walk where the bullet was going then he would not be guilty, for the wounded man walked in front of the pistol which was being discharged along a street in a crowded section of the city.

The effort to enforce rules and regulations in Washington against the automobile speed fiend is a farce and joke. I happened to be a witness some time ago in a case where an automobile driver criminally knocked the life out of a man, and in two or three minutes after the occurrence half a dozen or more negroes came up to where the negro driver who had knocked the life out of the man was held in the custody of a policeman and promptly told the policeman how carefully the driver of the automobile was proceeding and how negligently the man who was run over was walking. I knew that what these witnesses told the policeman was absolutely false, and yet their names were furnished to the authorities, and the driver of the automobile was fully exonerated on their testimony.

The truth is the law is not being enforced. The driver who kills a man has disposed of a witness. He and his friends swear for him just what is necessary to clear him, and it is swallowed and believed and the criminal discharged harmless. I am positive that what happened in the case which came under my personal observation is happening every day. One thing which would relieve the situation very much would be the employment of a squad of plain-clothes men to go over the city and report violations and have those that violate traffic rules arrested and tried at once. It is a poor policy to wait until some one is severely injured or killed before an arrest is made. It is still worse to make arrests when some one has been severely injured then make a joke of the whole situation by turning the criminal loose with a light fine or with no fine at all. We ought to have a squad of plain-clothes men patrolling the city and arresting violators of the speed and traffic regulations as fast as they occur without waiting for some one to be seriously injured. If this were done, there would be decidedly less violations of the law, scores of lives would be saved each year in Washington, hundreds of people who are injured would be saved harmless, and the streets of Washington would be at least reasonably safe for men, women, and children who themselves are observing the law. Drivers would be more careful, and I venture the assertion that the instance which I have just mentioned where the man was knocked lifeless at the intersection of Eighteenth and Mount Pleasant Streets would not have occurred if that driver had known that probably among the people passing this particular point there was a plain-clothes officer charged with the duty of making cases against people violating the traffic regulations of the city. It is my observation that the speed fiends and other autoist criminals here make at least a little effort to observe the rules in the presence of a uniformed official. What we need is a system whereby they may expect to be arrested at any moment regardless of whether there is a uniformed policeman in sight or not.

Mr. KUNZ. How many policemen did you find there where the accident you just mentioned occurred?

Mr. LANKFORD. A policeman finally came. I did not see any at first. I had to threaten using force to keep the driver from leaving before an officer came.

Mr. KUNZ. Is it not a fact that we have not enough policemen in this city?

Mr. LANKFORD. We probably have not, and we should have plain-clothes men to watch these cases and make arrests before serious harm is done by the criminal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for seven and one-half minutes.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, the discussion this morning has been very interesting, and I would like to have gotten into the discussion on the immigration proposition; but as my time is very limited, I merely want to call your attention to a letter which I have in my possession and which I feel the Members of this House ought to know about.

In doing this, it is necessary for me to give you a little history of bills which have been introduced in this House. On the 12th of January two identical bills were introduced in this House, one by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and one by myself, for the purpose of equalizing the compensation which was paid to young men who were in the training camps during the war. Certain young men sent me their claims from home, and I found that the young men who went in the first and second training camps received $100 a month, but a bill was passed providing for pay to parties in training camps of $100 per month up to June, 1918, and the department construed this act as only referring to men who had been assigned from line duty.

In discussing this matter with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] I found he had had the same trouble, and after taking up the matter with the Comptroller General we drew and introduced this bill for the relief of these soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have this short bill printed with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print a bill which he has introduced in connection with his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5333) authorizing the payment of claims of men of the Army and Marine Corps while in training for commissions in the combatant branches of the Army and Marine Corps, and authorizing appropriation therefor.

Be it enacted, etc., That there are hereby authorized and directed to be paid the claims of all men of the Army and Marine Corps the difference between the pay received by them and pay at $100 per month while in training in the training camps for commissions as officers in the combatant branches of the Army and Marine Corps for the actual period in training for such commissions during the period April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, who have not been so paid; and payments shall be made to all such men, whether they entered training camps direct from civil life or were detached from duty with their organization. An appropriation is hereby authorized to carry out the purposes of this act: Provided, That all such claims shall be settled in the General Accounting Office and shall be held as finally determined, and shall never thereafter be reopened or considered, except upon review or reconsideration by the Comptroller General of the United States: Provided further, That no check or warrant issued in payment of such claims shall be delivered to any person other than the claimant or claimants, and the check or warrant shall be mailed to the claimant or claimants at their actual bona fide address or addresses, and no fee or fees shall be paid to any attorney, attorneys, or agents or for prosecution of such claims on account of such training service arising under this or any other act.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The thing to which I wish to call your attention especially is a letter which is being circulated from Indianapolis, Ind. The letter is headed in this way:

John P. Fitzgerald, Twelfth Company. Ralph Muszar, Fifteenth Company. Camp Gordon Veterans' League, organizing veterans of Central Officers' Training School, Indianapolis, Ind.

Mr. H. A. Griffith—

There is no date on this letter—

Dear Buddy—

A stranger—

Under an act of Congress of June 15, 1917, all men who attended officers' training school were entitled to pay at the rate of $100 per month. However, this act did not carry any appropriation for such pay after June 30, 1918.

Now, as there were quite a few of us who were in training school after June 30, 1918, we should have received and are justly entitled to the same pay as the men who were in training school just a month or so before us; we were put to additional expense in the way of clothing, etc., and in all justice should be given the same pay as the men received who attended the earlier training schools.

It is our intention to have bills prepared and presented to both Senate and the House of Representatives asking that this matter be adjusted so that we may receive this additional pay.

From advice received by the party who had this letter sent to him I found that it was received by him on the 16th day of February, over a month after this bill had been prepared and introduced in the House and also introduced in the Senate by Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas.

In having these bills prepared and watching them through to a successful termination there will be certain expenses to be taken care of—necessary expenses—and we want you and all men who will be benefited by this legislation to help bear this necessary expense. We have made an estimate, and find that each man's pro rata share will be $5.

Now, gentlemen, how far-reaching is that? A few days ago a representative of the War Department was in my office and discussed this bill, after it had been referred by the Military Committee to that department, and he informed me that there were 82,000 who would be the beneficiaries under this bill if it were passed. So they have figured it out on that basis, and they say it will require $5 from each one of these men. You can see from this how large a fraud this is that they are undertaking to practice upon the soldiers.

As you are to receive benefits from the legislation and as the time to have these bills prepared and presented to Congress at this session is getting short, we ask that you join with us now; send in your share of this expense, so that we may get immediate action in this matter.

Mr. KELLER. To whom is the gentleman referring when he says "we"?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Fitzgerald and Muszar are the men who signed this letter, the men who wrote this letter, and it is signed that way, or, rather, Camp Gordon Veterans' League, by John P. Fitzgerald, secretary.

They state further that they will look after this matter after it is passed in seeing that each receives his share, when the bill which has been introduced provides that no expense shall be attached to the collection of the money and that no attorney or agent shall receive anything out of any compensation which may be voted for these boys. It was our idea that whatever was voted in the interest of these young men should go to them as net, and we felt that the Members of Congress would be glad to render them assistance in seeing that their claims were collected. Further on they state:

Do not let this matter drag; time is short; you will receive benefits of approximately $210 from this legislation.

That letter shows it is a fraud on its face, and it is an attempt, according to my idea, to get money under false pretenses and graft of the worst character, and I am further of the opinion they are guilty of using the mails for fraudulent purposes and attempting to rob the soldiers of this country who are the beneficiaries under this bill.

For what purposes do they want this money? I never heard of these people before. If they want it for the purpose of drafting bills, then let them be advised that it does not require money to have bills introduced in this House. If they want it to pay lobbyists, then let it be understood that no bill will pass this House when it is advocated by paid lobbyists. If it is for propaganda, then, as you know, we would all say, "God deliver us from any more propaganda, because we have had sufficient during this term of Congress."

I have called the attention of the Members of the House to this because I think it is a fraud and because I felt the Members of the House would be glad and would like to notify their boys at home not to give an organization of this kind any money under these circumstances. This is a just bill and should be passed, but, if passed at all, it will be passed alone upon its merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I merely want to corroborate what has been said by my good friend and colleague from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS]. The bill he mentions would have been jointly introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee and myself but for the rules, which forbid an introduction jointly by Members, and we introduced the bills separately at the same time. The subject matter of this legislation was called to our attention not by any attorneys or by any lobbyists but by reason of the fact that some of our own constituents wrote us with reference to compensation due them in attending training camps. In one instance an ex-service man who wrote me and who was entitled to receive compensation under a ruling of the department sent a letter of some attorney who had written him asking that he place his claim with him for collection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This is the reason that in drafting the bill the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] and I incorporated the provision that no attorneys' fees should be paid for those who handle these claims. It was to protect the soldiers against this species of graft, and I resent, in the same forceful language that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] does, the implication that it is necessary for ex-service men to pay money to anybody to get legislation passed through this Congress in their behalf. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 21 minutes remaining.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the purpose of any remarks I have to make to-day is to call attention to a condition in traffic which I think this Congress is as much to blame for as anybody else, and I believe it is only negligence that it is here. A good deal of criticism comes from time to time about reckless driving in the city of Washington. Perhaps there is some reckless driving, and there may be much of it, but there is another angle to safety in travel in a city, particularly in the congested parts and during the congested time of the day, which I think is just as important to the welfare and safety of the public as to be a careful driver, and that is to be a careful walker across the street. In the city of Washington I believe the pedestrian in crossing the street is more reckless than in any other city of the United States. Many times you will drive along the street where there is no street crossing in sight, even at dusk when it is not very light, and somebody will step out from behind a car and start diagonally across the street. The individual who jeopardizes his life ought to have no comeback in law if the driver of the vehicle that injures him has been driving in such a way as to have his car under control at all times. Every driver of an automobile expects an obstruction to come in the way at the street crossings, and in between the street crossings he has a right to expect a clear way; and, in fact, beyond that, I believe that he ought to be given a clear way in order to clear traffic off the streets. The problem of traffic to-day is one of the big problems in every city, and the only criticism I can make along that line in this city is that traffic is held on the streets a half longer than it ought to be to clear the way. Now, what could be remedied and what could be done to make it possible to get an automobile off of the street? I am sure that 90 per cent of the people in automobiles are going to some definite point.

There may be 10 per cent joy riding around. To do anything to clear off the streets for the joy rider would not help at all, but for the business man and the man who is going in a machine to some definite point, the quicker he can get there the quicker he gets off of one street and onto another, and your traffic is less congested. Then what could be done, and this is the part that Congress will be held responsible for, in my judgment? If you get in your automobile this afternoon and start down any street in the city where there are traffic officers—and let me just digress enough to say that I believe the traffic officers in the city of Washington are on a par with those in any city in the United States, and it is very, very seldom in my experience that I have ever encountered even a discourteous one. They are usually tolerant and courteous. Once in a while, as will happen in all crowds of people, you will find a man who is an exception, but if you start down the street this afternoon and the traffic officer stops you, we will say, at Sixth Street, and you are going down Pennsylvania Avenue, you will stay there until the traffic going across Pennsylvania Avenue is through, and then he will turn the sign and let you through, and just about the time you get your car started well up goes the block on Seventh Street, and it continues that way all the way down the Avenue. You can not blame the traffic officers for that, because there is no way to-day whereby the traffic cop on Sixth Street can tell what the traffic officers on Seventh Street and Ninth Street and Eleventh Street and Thirteenth Street are going to do. So what is the solution? The only solution is for this Congress to appropriate enough money so that on the main thoroughfares you can have it like it is in New York and Philadelphia on the main thoroughfares, a semaphore system which gives you the right of way to drive for three or four or five minutes and then drive at a speed that will get you off of the street. There is not any reason, there is not any sense, in an 8 or 10 mile an hour speed limit in traffic other than the fact that you have not got your problem solved so that you can get rid of your traffic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. BEGG. Take the situation at Seventeenth and Pennsylvania Avenue, when a great crowd of automobiles on Seventeenth Street start to go across and they are flagged and are turned up on Pennsylvania Avenue to go across and turn around and get on the other side of Pennsylvania Avenue and come back to Seventeenth Street and then go down the street. That kind of an arrangement only increases the congestion of traffic, and it is not to the best interests of getting traffic off of the streets. I am not offering this as a criticism of the traffic officers. I am offering it as one of the problems of the traffic situation in Washington, and I believe that part of the burden of responsibility rests on us for not appropriating the amount of money necessary to furnish the equipment, so they can lay the city out with direct traffic streets, so that when they give you the right of way you can expect to drive 10 blocks and not have somebody switch in on a side street and run into you. I believe that if such an arrangement was worked out traffic accidents in the city of Washington could be reduced by at least 50 per cent.

Just as a clincher to what I have tried to tell you, I will recite my experience last summer. In coming back to Washington I came by New York and Philadelphia. I had never driven an automobile in New York City, and I would rather drive down Broadway or Fifth Avenue this afternoon in my automobile with my family and would feel more secure than I would to take it at 5 o'clock and start to go from here to my apartment or to my home out in the northwest. Why? Simply because I know that when the semaphore flashes the signal to go I am going to be permitted to go, and there is no one to come in from a side street and wreck me broadside.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will take the 10 minutes I yielded to myself and endeavor to say something about the bill before the committee. I will state that the bill as originally introduced has the approval of the District of Columbia Commissioners and the Director of the Budget. The members of the subcommittee of the District of Columbia Committee which considered this bill made a number of changes. We have endeavored in the increase granted to confine our recommendations within reasonable limits and bounds. The aggregate increases carried in the bill approximate about 10 per cent. We have granted to the policemen of the District the following increases: Privates of the first class, an increase of from $1,700 to $1,800; to privates of the second class, from $1,800 to $1,900; to privates of the third class, from $1,900 to $2,100; sergeants, from $2,040 to $2,400; lieutenants, from $2,240 to $2,700; lieutenant detectives, $2,640 to $3,000; captains, $2,640 to $3,000; inspectors, $2,640 to $3,250; assistant superintendent, $3,000 to $3,500; and to the major and superintendent, $4,500 to $5,200.

In the fire department we propose an increase for private, class 1, from $1,700 to $1,800; class 2, $1,800 to $1,900; class 3, $1,900 to $2,100; marine fireman, $1,700 to $1,800; marine engineer's assistant, $1,900 to $2,150; marine engineer, $1,940 to $2,250; pilot, $1,940 to $2,250; assistant superintendent of machinery, $2,240 to $2,500; superintendent of machinery, $2,740 to $3,250; sergeant, $1,940 to $2,200; captain, $2,140 to $2,500; inspector, $1,900 to $2,000; deputy fire marshal, $2,240 to $2,500; fire marshal, $2,640 to $3,250; deputy chief engineer, $3,000 to $3,500; and the chief engineer, $4,000 to $5,200.

The total increase of the police department is $197,460. The total pay roll under the present law is $1,873,440. The total pay roll as provided in this bill is $2,072,900.

The fire department is increased from $1,319,040 to a total pay roll as carried in this bill of $1,466,200.

The total increase carried in the bill for the fire department is $147,160. The bill also provides that the members of the police department and the fire department shall be allowed one day of rest in seven. This will necessitate 139 additional privates in the police department and will necessitate, assuming such a number is immediately appointed, an appropriation of $250,000.

In the fire department one day of rest in seven will require 105 additional men and an expenditure of $189,000. So the total increase in the two departments as carried in this bill amounts to $344,620 in the way of increase.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The bill carries a proposed increased salary for the police.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. What per cent?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. About 10 per cent, but less than that for privates.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does it contemplate that we will have more efficient service with reference to pedestrians than we now have? Does the gentleman happen to know the intention of the police force?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The members of the police department and the members of the fire department have assured the committee that they expect to render the highest possible service. I will say that we have one of the most efficient police forces in the country, and I can say the same of the fire department.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I noticed one day last week that the driver of an automobile struck a negro woman about the office building and dragged her all the way across that square and he escaped and he never was caught by the police department. On the same day a white woman was killed down near Seventh Street. What excuse can the police authorities give for that?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Let me say to the gentleman that the Capitol grounds are not under the supervision of the Metropolitan police force.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. This was not on the Capitol grounds, this was on B Street. The newspaper account of it was that the woman was struck and dragged all the way across the block to Brown's café. Does the gentleman from Maryland think that is efficient service?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say that as a matter of record during the past year the police department of the city of Washington had a 100 per cent record in the apprehension of criminals.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does the gentleman remember how many assaults upon women and how many of the parties were caught in the city of Washington? If that is efficiency, I should like to know it.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I have not the figures, but they have been put in the record several times by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I must say that the gentleman's figures are not very reliable if reports are correct. Now, I am in favor of paying policemen well. However, I happen to have lived in several different small cities, ranging from 10,000 to 50,000 inhabitants. The gentleman speaks of the efficiency of the police force of this city. I think there is less efficiency here in the police force when it comes to protection of women upon whom assaults are made, and protection of pedestrians who would like to walk the streets feeling a measure of safety, than in any other city I have ever been in, and the streets here are very much wider than they are in other cities.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Is the gentleman familiar with the statistics in other cities? Does he not know that there has been an epidemic of crime in the great cities. I think the gentleman will find the record of this city compares more than favorably with that of the others.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does not the gentleman think that the daily casualties in the city of Washington are about twice as heavy as they have been in other cities in the last few years, when it comes to automobile accidents?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is true they have been greater than those of some other cities, but not twice.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. What is the explanation of that, when the streets here are almost twice as wide as they are in other cities?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Oh, that is a very long story, and I would not have time to go into it now.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does not the gentleman think that makes a record for efficiency?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I think the police department has done as well as it could under the existing laws and the crowded conditions of the local courts, and the releasing of many men on small collateral.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the organic law fix the number of officers and privates on the police force?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Not to my knowledge. It is my understanding that the number of the police force was fixed by law of Congress passed in 1919.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. How many were permitted?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I can not tell the gentleman right now.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In section 2 of the bill there is a provision for the authorization of 35 lieutenant detectives.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. That is existing law.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The amendment strikes that out, so that the bill as presented with the committee amendments does not increase the number of officers or the number of privates. The gentleman's report indicates that since one day in seven is to be given, the number of privates will have to be increased.

I am asking the question only to be sure that the bill accomplishes just what the gentleman desires. Did the gentleman understand that this bill creates additional officers or men?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. It is not my idea that this bill in general terms by direction changes the existing number of policemen, but it is my opinion that if Congress should pass this bill in its present form and these men were to be given by direction of law one day's rest in seven, and Congress wants to keep the same number of men on police duty and fire duty throughout the 24 hours that they now have, it would be necessary to increase the number of firemen and policemen by one-seventh.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This bill creates a necessity for an additional number of men and as I understand the gentleman the bill itself does not provide for them. The bill as originally drawn did make provision for additional ones.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; the gentleman is mistaken, the 35 detectives constitute the number now on the force under existing law.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit me, the police and fire departments in the District of Columbia were the only two departments paid by the Government who were not granted a day off in lieu of Sunday out of every seven. The committee in considering that matter thought it was just to the policemen and firemen to accord to them what has been accorded every other employee of this Government, and they provided for that in this bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am not talking about that at all.

Mr. BLANTON. There is where the additional men come in. That is the only provision of the bill that requires additional men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired. All time has expired and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the annual basic salaries of the officers and members of the Metropolitan police force shall be as follows: Major and superintendent, $5,200; assistant superintendents, $3,500 each; inspector in charge of detective headquarters, $3,730; inspectors, $3,250 each; lieutenant assistant to inspector in charge of detective headquarters, $2,980; captains, $2,800 each; lieutenant detectives, $2,600 each; lieutenants, $2,500 each; sergeants, $2,200 each; privates of class 3, $2,100 each; privates of class 2, $1,900 each; privates of class 1, $1,800 each. Driver-privates shall have the same rank and pay as privates of the above classes. Members of said police force who may be mounted on horses, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $450 per annum; members of said force who may be mounted on motor vehicles, furnished and maintained by themselves, shall each receive an extra compensation of $480 per annum; members of said force who may be mounted on bicycles shall each receive an extra compensation of $70 per annum; members of said force detailed for special service in the various precincts in the prevention and detection of crime shall each receive an extra compensation of $180 per annum; and members detailed to the motorcycle service shall each receive an extra compensation of $120 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that unless there is a different order it would be necessary probably to report each amendment separately.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments may be reported and voted upon en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the committee amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "each," strike out the words "inspector in charge of detective headquarters, $3,730."

Page 1, line 7, after the word "each," strike out the semicolon and the words "lieutenant assistant to inspector in charge of detective headquarters, $2,980," and insert a colon and the words: "Provided, That the inspector assigned to the supervision and command of the detective bureau shall during the period of such assignment be rated as and shall receive the pay of an assistant superintendent."

Page 2, line 3, strike out "$2,800" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,000."

Page 2, line 4, strike out the words "lieutenant detectives, $2,600 each"; and in the same line strike out the figures "$2,500" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$2,700"; and after the word "each," in line 5, page 2, insert a colon and the words: "Provided, That the lieutenant assigned as assistant to the inspector commanding the detective bureau shall during the period of such assignment hold the rank and receive the pay of a captain."

Page 2, line 8, strike out "$2,200" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,400."

Page 2, line 9, strike out "$2,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,100."

Page 2, line 15, strike out the words "mounted on" and insert "called upon to use"; and in line 18, after the word "annum," insert "members of said force detailed to detective headquarters in the prevention and detection of crime shall each receive extra compensation of $600 per annum."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I desire recognition, Mr. Chairman, in opposition to the committee amendment; but let my friend from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN] go ahead first.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I desire to discuss the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if I understand the purpose of this amendment it is to increase the salary of the members of the police force and other officials of the city who are now serving and is not to increase the number of the force. As I understand, some of these increases range a little above 10 per cent. So far as I am personally concerned, I would be glad of an opportunity to reduce expenses rather than increase them. Yesterday we were engaged in the consideration of legislation for the reduction of taxation. Of course, we can not reduce taxes if, after voting tax reduction one day, we engage next day in raising salaries. If we pursue such policy, it will be only a question of time when we shall have to increase taxes again. If we could increase the efficiency of the service by an increase of compensation, and I could be assured of that fact, I might be willing to vote for the proposed increase.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the only motive that prompts me to support these increases—the assurance given by the police department and the fire department that if we grant them these increases they can weed out from their force inefficient men, men not qualified, and get the highest-class men available, and that they will give us a model service, the best in the United States. Usually I am not in favor of any kind of increases, but I am in favor of an increase for these men who risk their lives daily. There is hardly a day passes but that when they leave home they do not know that they will ever get back alive to their wives and children. If they assure us that they will give us good service, I believe in giving them an increase.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. If I were a policeman, I might believe my life endangered if I undertook to walk around the streets of this city, especially just at a time when some one else might desire to cross the street in an automobile. I think their lives are endangered often in this way when they walk the streets. But the trouble is that their lives are not endangered in many instances by trying to protect the lives of people of the city. I fear they do not always make an honest effort to protect the citizens.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman is doing a little injustice to the police force in saying that. There are some high-class men on this police force. Of course, they have some others, but the main body of them are men of the highest character.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I want a guaranty from them before I vote an increase. I want to know whether they will get rid of those who have not been discharging their duties. Last year, if I have the figures correct, this city was the second among all the cities of the United States, regardless of population, for casualties caused by automobile accidents. Is that correct?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I understood there were about 60 automobile accidents.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I think it was 85 persons killed here, and year before last it was 97. Last year, I believe, the city of Los Angeles, Calif., was the only city in the United States where the death rate from automobile accidents was as high as that in Washington. Yet here is a city with streets 300 feet wide—no reason for hurting pedestrians—and yet a man must ofttimes risk his life to cross the street.

Mr. ALLGOOD. There have been, as I understand, more than 8,000 violations of the traffic regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ALLGOOD. There were over 8,000 violations. I wonder if the gentleman does not think that the courts are somewhat to blame. It looks as if the policemen were arresting violators all right, but the courts must be to blame for not enforcing fines on those violators. There were 8,000 violations of the law in a year.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I do not know just where the trouble is, but I presume there must be some fault with the policemen themselves. When 97 people are killed in one year in this city and about 90 in another by automobiles, it becomes a startling situation. When a man can not safely cross a street 300 feet wide in the Capital of the Nation something is wrong.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. For a brief question.

Mr. BEGG. Does not the gentleman think that the man crossing the street is more responsible than the driver of the automobile? Is not the important thing the requirement that the man shall cross at the crossing and not between blocks?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does the gentleman know of anybody that was killed who was not killed on the crossing?

Mr. BEGG. I venture the assertion that most of the accidents occurred at places other than on the crossings.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Give the facts. I do not want the gentleman to "venture the assertion." Give the facts. Name them.

Mr. BEGG. I saw one accident myself up on Florida avenue and Fourteenth street. The man was not killed, but was hurt by an automobile.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Was he walking across the street at the crossing?

Mr. BEGG. No; he was walking across at some other place than the crossing. I think the gentleman will find that in other cities people walk across the street at the crossings, while here never.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Pedestrians usually cross at the proper places. Does the gentleman drive a car?

Mr. BEGG. Yes; I have driven a car, and I never have hit anybody, but we may do it at any time.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Maybe that affects the gentleman's judgment. I have to dodge for my life almost onto the sidewalk.

Mr. BEGG. Not if the gentleman will observe the traffic cop's orders and walk within the marked lines.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The gentleman should know that is seldom the case. One woman was killed over here near the Capitol this week. Almost every time a Member of Congress crosses the white lines between the House Office Building and the Capitol he takes his life in his own hands. He usually runs great risk.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And the gentleman knows, if he drives a car, that he has to watch out for the reckless driver. That is where the danger lies.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes; that is exactly the situation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And bearing on the case of the old charwoman who was killed right on the crossing two or three days ago, if the party who was driving that automobile had been held up by a policeman that poor, old charwoman would not have lost her life; and yet she was where she had a right to be.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes. And the press said not only that but that she was dragged a whole block and that the guilty party, having killed the poor, old negress, escaped. Not a policeman in the whole city of Washington to arrest him, yet he had miles to go to get out of the city. On the same day another old lady, 50 years old, was killed at another place by an automobile, and to show our gratitude we are asked to raise the salaries of the police force.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has my friend ever investigated to find out how many police officers there are in this city in comparison with other cities? I think that is a matter which should be investigated. In Detroit some time ago they had the same sort of a situation which is complained of here, and what they did there was to increase the number of policemen and organize an efficient traffic squad. One difficulty here has been a shortage of men.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I have never yet seen any department in Washington City that did not have plenty of employees. I think the great trouble is that they have too many, but I am not sure how many they have on the police force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, may I have just one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. In addition to those who were killed, there were quite a number of casualties which did not prove fatal.

For just a minute I want to speak in behalf of the women of this city. The great number of assaults that were made upon women in this city last year is enough to make the blood of every American citizen boil. To think that a negro, or a white man, either, can come here under the Dome of the Capitol and outrage the women of this land, and never arrested or punished, is a disgrace to the Nation. Gentlemen, that is a serious matter, and, so far as I am concerned, I want more than assurances when you talk about raising the salaries of our police force. I want a guaranty that the life and virtue of women at the Capital will be safe and sacred. That is a condition which does not exist now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] is recognized.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Before the gentleman from Indiana proceeds, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I would not ask that. The gentlemen have some things on their system which they want to get off, and I think we should let them do it. I would not try to limit them, and you will get along faster by it.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the time be divided equally between those who favor the bill and those who oppose it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will try to so divide it.

Mr. STENGLE. I hope the Chair will. Some of us would like to speak in favor of the bill and not hear from all those who oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Chairman, whom does the Chair recognize?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I sought to find out from the members of the committee in general debate whether or not there is any limitation in the organic law as to the number of officers and privates on the police force. I do not know, because I have not examined it. If there is not, I think this bill, as they propose to amend it, is in order; but if there is a limitation, the bill does not accomplish anything, because it does not increase the number, although it proposes a law which creates a necessity for a great increase.

Mr. BLANTON. They have been increasing them as fast as the Congress, through the Appropriations Committee would give them the money. Therefore, I take it, the organic law makes no restriction, because the police force has been increased from time to time whenever the Appropriations Committee would grant the estimate made by the commissioners.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I thank my friend from Texas. In 1917 there was this provision in the appropriation bill:

> And the provision in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1913, which provides: "After June 30, 1912, there shall be no appointments except by promotion," etc., "until the whole number of privates in all of said classes shall have been reduced to 640."

In 1913 there seems to have been a limitation placed on the appropriation bill which was in the nature of general law and was the same as if it were the organic law making the number of privates 640, and that seems to have been repealed by the appropriation act of 1917. I do not know whether there has been any change or not.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to the gentleman that we had the inspector of the police department and of the fire department go over this bill, and the provisions of it were approved by them.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And the amendments.

Mr. BLANTON. The various paragraphs of the bill and the amendments of the committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. The second section provides for additional officers and additional men, and that is stricken out by the committee amendment, so there is nothing in the bill except to raise the salaries of the different officers and of the different men and to provide that they shall have a rest one day in seven.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will state to the gentleman that the language stricken out in section 2 is existing law. Thirty-five is the number of lieutenant detectives now.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That may be the number that is appropriated for and that is exactly what I am trying to find out. I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is accurate when he says there is no limitation.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think so. It is dependent on the appropriation Congress gives them.

Mr. HAMMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HAMMER. I simply wanted to say to the gentleman that there clearly would have to be more policemen appointed, because the provision providing for one day of rest in seven will necessarily require that and there will have to be an appropriation by Congress in a deficiency bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is no doubt about that, and we can provide for it when we come to the matter of appropriations. The thing I was driving at was whether you had any law to provide for your additional 139, and if there is no limitation you do not need any provision, but I notice the report says that for the police department the one-day rest in seven provision will require 139 additional privates of class I.

I am going to support this measure, Mr. Chairman, not because I have studied it carefully and know whether this is a just rate to be paid or not but because I am going to trust the District Committee, but this is a very great increase in pay. It is substantially 10 per cent to the men themselves, and one day in seven means 14⅔ per cent, which makes substantially a 25 per cent increase in the cost to the Government of paying these police officers. I take it the gentlemen who have reported this measure have investigated the question of the rest of one day in seven to police officers in other jurisdictions, and that this is a just measure, but I was rather surprised to find out that in this one measure there is practically a 25 per cent increase in the cost of the police force.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Some of us think it is not high enough, as the bill stands now, compared with other cities, so that it is not the maximum, in my judgment, that ought to have been provided.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think we should pay these police officers well, and I think the police officers in the city of Washington, in a general way, measure up to the high standard of the police officers of this country. They have their difficulties, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLER. This is a compromise salary bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Michigan a question?

Mr. McKEOWN and Mr. STENGLE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Virginia opposed to the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. McKEOWN. Gentlemen, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that the police ought to be well paid; but, on the other hand, I am reminded when it comes to increasing salaries in this Congress of the great petition of the farmers of the United States brought here by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in which the farmers asked that there be no more increases in salaries and that there be no more increases in the number of officers. It does seem to me that this could have gone on for at least another year, until the country has somewhat recovered, before we bring such an increase in here. I would be inclined to follow the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], because he is a very safe and sound man to follow on the question of economy, but I do not think at this time you ought to bring increases in here. You have talked about the police force. It is a very dangerous business and is very dangerous work. I do not think the trouble in Washington is so much from the police force; I think the trouble comes from the fact that you do not have sufficient penalties to penalize and punish these people who have no regard for human life. There ought to be a statute in this city that any man who shows an abandoned disposition touching the matter of human life ought to be a felon and go to the penitentiary, and whenever you put some of these birds in the penitentiary you are going to have safer driving in Washington, and you are not going to have it until then. You talk about your policemen; the engineer who pulls a passenger train at midnight through the country has on every hand signals of danger. He has lights all along the way he goes to show him the danger, but the policeman going down through a back alley in the darkness of the night has nothing to show him the danger of the assassin or the burglar or the bootlegger; and, by the way, the bootlegger has become one of the most dangerous criminals in the country to-day. He has become an abandoned criminal. He cares not for human life and he is a dangerous element which the police have to deal with; but aside from that, gentlemen, what ought we to do in the city of Washington? What ought the Congress of the United States to do?

In my humble judgment, the Congress of the United States ought to give to the city of Washington a Territorial form of government at the earliest possible moment. They ought to have a Territorial form of government and the Congress of the United States ought to set aside the amount of money that goes to the city of Washington, and that ought to be all required of the Appropriations Committee. Then let the District of Columbia have a legislature, say, of 24 members in the house and 12 senators; let there be a governor appointed by the President of the United States; give them a Delegate in the House, and let the legislature levy its taxes and let it appropriate the money which Congress appropriates in bulk to them; and let them have their own government and not take up the time of the Congress here when we ought to be engaged in business for all the great cities of the country. The District gets one-thirteenth of the time of the United States Congress, and yet it constitutes only one two-hundred-and-fifteenth part of the population of the United States. Gentlemen, this is serious.

The District gets two days out of every month. The men on the Committee on the District of Columbia are the hardest-worked Members of the Congress, outside, probably, of the Committee on Appropriations. They have to wrestle with these matters that should be settled here in the District by the people themselves. The Congress ought to get rid of this unnecessary burden. It ought to reserve the right to disapprove any act that the legislature of the District of Columbia passed any time within two years. The statutes would be in force unless it is disapproved by such act of Congress. I think the time is here now when the Congress of the United States ought to act on this question. We have some of the best Members of this House whose time is taken up on matters of the District of Columbia, whose talents ought to be engaged in the great questions that are confronting the whole people; and I say to you that the personnel of that committee is as good as any committee we have in the House. They are now wrestling with the rent question here in the District of Columbia. I say that if you will turn these people over to a territorial form of government, give them a governor and a legislature and let them solve their own difficulties, they will be better solved and you will have less trouble.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Chairman, I have no intention of engaging in any heated discussion on this subject, but I felt after hearing some remarks made on the bill that it probably would not be amiss if I made a few observations. Let me say in the beginning that during the past six years I have actively participated in the making of more than 25,000 policemen in the largest city in this country. During that same period I have had to do with the promotion from grade to grade of the entire force, numbering 12,000 men. It is all right to talk about giving the vote to the District of Columbia, if that is the subject before us, but if I understand this bill it is merely and purely a question of giving to the policemen and firemen in this city a reasonable compensation upon which to exist while they undertake to perform their public duty.

I am sometimes amazed at the wonderful economy displayed by my colleagues who will argue here for two hours or more that we are giving these poor fellows too much money when only two weeks ago without ever looking into the details they were voting daily 50, 80, and 90 per cent increases for the supervisory officials in the Departments of the Interior, the Treasury, and the Post Office. If you want to be economists why not cut down the salaries of such men as those instead of taking from these men the measly salaries they draw in trying to get an honest and decent livelihood?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENGLE. I will yield gladly.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think the gentleman from Indiana can charge up against the police and firemen's increase their day off in lieu of Sunday which everybody has?

Mr. STENGLE. He should not unless he charges for the day and a half of employees of the city and the Government and make that a part of the increase in the salary that we are proclaiming we are going to give them. It is customary, gentlemen, to give every man his day off for rest. It is nothing unusual to see a man in public service, with the exception of Members of Congress, have his day off for rest. We never get it here. But these men are entitled to it. The fact that a man gets run down on a public highway is an incident and not an argument in favor of or against the increase of salary for patrolmen who happen per se to be standing on the crossing. The whole question before us, as I understand it, is just this: Are we giving them too much, or are we giving them too little? I say to you, based on an experience that is greater than any of those I have heard here on the floor, that $2,100 as a maximum for a patrolman in this District is entirely too small, as compared with $1,200 in the smaller cities. We give $2,500 in the city of New York, and give them time off and we do not cry about it.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STENGLE. Gladly.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. I have here a table showing the average pay of patrolmen in 98 cities in the United States, and the average is $2,376.

Mr. STENGLE. We pay the street cleaners more in New York City than you pay your patrolmen in the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired, and the question is on the committee amendments to section 1.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments to section 1 were agreed to.

Mr. KUNZ. Mr. Chairman, I make a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman can not make that motion in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, is not that the same as moving to strike out the enacting clause?

Mr. KUNZ. I do not care to move to strike out the enacting clause. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill, while I am not opposing it, I believe in raising the salaries of these men who are on the police force in Washington. But so far as the citizens of Washington are concerned, it gives to them no protection. This bill does not increase the number of men; it simply increases the salaries. What we need in Washington is more protection with uniformed policemen. When you drive along the streets of Washington, you know very well that you are liable to find somebody coming along at a rate of 30 or 40 miles an hour, and unless you are very careful you are going to have some one run into you. If we had policemen enough to protect the people of Washington, you would have them in uniform and they would be a prevention of crime; they would prevent accidents. It is too late after some one has been injured.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is reminded that the time for debate was limited and exhausted.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may finish his five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. KUNZ. The trouble is that while this is District of Columbia day, Members have had so much poison injected into their systems with other matters that their minds are not in position to properly discuss this subject. We have men on the District Committee who come and talk about economy, never taking into consideration the fact that conditions are different here, that requirements are different. They are reading into the RECORD letters and telegrams in order to apprise their constituents of how busy they are in economizing for the great Government of the United States. We have men who have come here and know nothing about city life—they come from the State of Texas, and might make good farmers, might make good country lawyers, but so far as running a city like Washington they have not the remotest idea of it. I want to call attention to the fact that in this bill an increase has been made to these men, and I believe justly so. The man who rides a horse has his salary decreased because some gentleman wants to economize and show to the people of his district that he was here and objected to the people of this country paying to support Washington and Washingtonians. What we need is more money for protection. If this Congress would appropriate more money for more men, you would have better protection and you would have less accidents on the streets in the city of Washington.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KUNZ. Yes.

Mr. STENGLE. I notice the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is here. Will the gentleman kindly address those remarks to him?

Mr. KUNZ. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who formerly served in the city council of the city of Chicago, well knows the condition of Washington, far better than a number of men who are now here trying to economize, and I know that the gentleman who presides as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is willing to do for Washington what he did for Chicago when he was chairman of the finance committee of the common council of that city. He understands the condition, and, as I said before, you have men who are penny-wise and pound-foolish, who are all the time objecting to and opposing appropriations which ought to be made in the interest of this great city. If these gentlemen will only take more interest and save more time by less talk, filling the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, there would be a greater saving and more good done for the people of the country. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. In addition to the officers now authorized by law, the Metropolitan police force shall consist of 35 lieutenant detectives, to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in lieu of the 35 privates now authorized to be detailed to detective headquarters for special service in the detection and prevention of crime. Any of the privates so detailed at the time this act takes effect may be so appointed without examination.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of section 2.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the committee amendment. Our colleague from Illinois [Mr. KUNZ] has taken a most ridiculous position upon the floor of the House. When there was nothing before the committee except to begin reading another part of the bill; when the committee had agreed upon the former section and was ready to do something else, he took up five minutes of our time in an attempt to give this committee a lecture about wasting the time of the committee in windbagging and about how little some people knew about things. I want him to read over his remarks in the morning when they appear in the RECORD if he lets them go in, and he will see just how much enlightenment he gave us. I noticed that he mentioned the State of Texas. I hail from that great State; and in connection with that he spoke in derision of the economy of reducing the extra allowance for a policeman who kept a horse to $450. The idea of such a thing! Some men could get rich stabling horses at $450 each. The gentleman from Illinois has thoroughbred horses. He imagines that it costs a policeman as much to barn a police horse here as it does him to take care of those fine horses of his in Chicago.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois is not particularly friendly to the great State of Texas on account of the fact that a gentleman from that State—I think from the gentleman's own district—broke up the sale of gold bricks in the city of Chicago, and there were three citizens less in that city after he left there.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and that is what is probably disturbing his equanimity. My colleague refers to the incident when a horseman from west Texas went to Chicago and they tried to sell him the usual gold brick. But at the same time he handed them his $5,000 he picked up the real brick of gold and would not let them take it off to wrap it up and thus make the exchange for something worthless, and when they assaulted him there were three less gold-brick sellers in Chicago; and a Chicago jury cleared the Texan of wrongdoing.

Mr. HUDSPETH. He still remembers that incident?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Show me a man who knows anything much about horses and about maintaining them who would claim that a man should be allowed more than $450 a year for maintaining one. That is what the committee cuts that down to. A larger amount was expected of your committee, and we thought that $450 was sufficient to maintain a policeman's horse.

If you will confer with your constituents who keep horses, even in livery stables, you will find that it can be done within that sum. There is nothing picayune about it, nor extravagant. We allowed what we thought was a fair allowance for maintaining a horse in the District, and I want to say to the gentleman that all of these policemen who are mounted have barns on their premises in the outskirts of the city where they keep their horses.

Mr. KUNZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; certainly I yield to my friend from Chicago.

Mr. KUNZ. Is it not a fact that the committee reduced the keep of a horse under what was allowed last year?

Mr. BLANTON. I think they were allowed $480 last year. They asked $540, and we reduced it to $450.

Mr. KUNZ. So that the policeman gets $30 less this year than last?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. The committee thought $450 was enough to keep a horse.

Mr. KUNZ. But feed is not any cheaper than it was last year.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but we paid them too much last year; these policemen do not feed their horses as the gentleman from Chicago does his thoroughbreds, and when they ship one of them they do not ride in palace cars, as do the horses of the gentleman from Illinois, and they do not have a special man in care of them, as do the horses of the gentleman from Illinois. And they are not specially blanketed as his are. The gentleman has an idea about only one specific thing, and the committee has general ideas about a whole combination of things. The committee is looking at the matter from the standpoint of the interest of the American people and not from the viewpoint of thoroughbred-horse fanciers in Chicago. I hope the distinguished gentleman will study up on this question before he again endeavors to lecture the members of the committee who worked hard on this bill.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the annual basic salaries of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia shall be as follows: Chief engineer, $5,200; deputy chief engineers, $3,500 each; battalion chief engineers, $3,050 each; fire marshal, $3,250; deputy fire marshal, $2,500; inspectors, $2,000 each; captains, $2,500 each; lieutenants, $2,350 each; sergeants, $2,200 each; superintendent of machinery, $3,250; assistant superintendent of machinery, $2,500; pilots, $2,250 each; marine engineers, $2,250 each; assistant marine engineers, $2,150 each; marine firemen, $1,800 each; privates of class 3, $2,000 each; privates of class 2, $1,900 each; privates of class 1, $1,800 each.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, line 21, strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,100."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McSWEENEY rose.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWEENEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KUNZ] has spoken about extravagance in expenditures. I am greatly in favor of tax reduction and of reducing all of the expenditures of Government, but I do believe a sharp distinction must be drawn as between expenditures which are foolish and those that might be classed as good, sound investments. I feel there are no men in civil life who so jeopardize themselves as the firemen and policemen of a community. As a member of my own local volunteer fire department, I realize as my community grows that there are added difficulties for these men. I feel it to be a real investment to do something to provide better men, better equipment, and to let them have a standard of living that every other group has. We all realize that the basis of pay has been generally fixed according to the hazard of the work in which men are engaged.

You realize that back in the old days, when James B. Eads built the bridge across the Mississippi River, the men who were engaged in that work were allowed $6 or $8 per hour because they were subjected to great danger and difficulty. That was back in the old days when the present modern high wages were unknown. Now, we know that the man in the police department or in the fire department is subjected to difficulties, and yet he receives a relatively low rate of wages. Nowadays the firemen have to protect higher buildings and larger structures, and the larger the structures are the greater the danger. These men in the fire department and in the police department who are now asking for an increase of wages are the ones that should be considered. The policemen, as the city of Washington grows, have increased difficulties and increased labor to perform. Traffic is increasing, and these men have to watch over the safety of the citizens.

We realize that with every law that is passed to protect the citizens greater difficulty arises for these men who have charge of its enforcement. Therefore I am in favor of regarding this not as an expenditure but as an investment, and I am in favor of giving these men who are serving this community, which is the National Capital of America, some increase, and allow them to have the compensation that men should have in hazardous occupations.

We realize that the miner is a man of that type who is subjecting himself to dangers, and he should be paid accordingly, and the same is true with respect to the locomotive engineers, and that they should be paid more than the ordinary man in the quiet pursuits of life; and therefore I favor this bill and shall ardently support it, and I hope that we shall be able to give these men better opportunities for themselves and families, and I am sure that they will deserve it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak on this bill, and I may wander a little in doing so. I was in some doubt in the beginning as to whether the provision of this bill which gives Sunday, or a day off in the week in lieu of service, was the proper thing to be done, but I find on some investigation that it is becoming the practice all over the United States. It has been the policy in the city from which I come for a long while, and I understand that as a result of that it is altogether likely that you will get a better class of men; at any rate you will do more justice to whatever class of men you get.

I do not think the wages proposed are higher perhaps than they ought to be under existing circumstances, so that I shall very cheerfully support the bill.

For one I was sorry not to have been here to speak on the question of inspectors. I do not think there should be any differentiation in the pay granted to inspectors. I think all inspectors should be paid alike. I notice that this bill provides that one inspector, while serving as head of the detective service, shall be given the rank of assistant superintendent and $250 additional pay. I do not think the work of an inspector of the detective service is any more important than the work of inspectors of other services. It may be, but I doubt it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. He is in charge of 36 men under him, and he is responsible for what they do. Does not the gentleman think we should pay $250 extra to him?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, the other inspectors also have men under them, and they are responsible for them.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. You recognize the difference in the service?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I recognize what the difference in the service is, but I do not see any difference in the importance of the service. I do not think it requires a man to be a greater genius as inspector in the detective service than in the traffic service or any other service. In fact, I think the man in charge of the traffic service has a much more arduous job than the other man. He does not deal with the same class of cases, it is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. We pay the distinguished gentleman from Illinois $7,500 a year——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; $150 a week——

Mr. BLANTON. And that is about one-fourth of what the gentleman could make at home——

Mr. MADDEN. About one-tenth——

Mr. BLANTON. But the man who presides over the gentleman, the man who presides over the House, the Speaker, receives $12,000, or $4,500 more, because he is the supervising officer.

Mr. MADDEN. But the inspector of the detective service has jurisdiction over only a certain branch of the police work. If you are going to call one branch of the police work more important than any other, it is all right. But you are simply giving to Mr. Grant an increase of pay because his name is Grant or because he presides over the detective service. I do not know which it is.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The committee looked upon the detective force of the District of Columbia as the most important branch of the work in the city. The members of the detective force are all selected, and the sergeants and other officers are given a little increase over the other policemen. The privates get $60 a year more.

Mr. BLANTON. They are sergeants. It is not because they are privates but sergeants. They are detective sergeants.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They can be sent back at any time.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Then they will be demoted when that is done. But whatever the committee did, I suppose, is wise, and I will not controvert that.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I understood the gentleman to say that he would support the bill and that the salaries were satisfactory.

Mr. MADDEN. I say they are not exorbitant.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The raises are about from 10 to 25 per cent.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it is about 25 per cent increase in cost, because of the fact that they are given one day a week off.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. There is a bill drawn to increase the compensation of the employees of the House. I understand that increase will be about 5 per cent. Why not give the House employees an increase commensurate with these employees of the city?

Mr. MADDEN. What the House authorized the gentleman from Illinois, and those associated with him, to do was to reclassify the salaries in accordance with the reclassification act, and we are carrying out the instructions of the House. If the House does not agree with us when we report, the gentleman knows what it can do.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That in lieu of Sunday there shall be granted to the Metropolitan police and to each officer and member of the fire department of the District of Columbia one day off out of each week of seven days, which shall be in addition to his annual leave and sick leave now allowed by law: Provided, however, That whenever the Commissioners of the District of Columbia declare that an emergency exists of such a character as to require the continuous service of all the members of the Metropolitan police force, the major and superintendent of police shall have authority, and it shall be his duty, to suspend and discontinue the granting of the said one day off in seven during the continuation of such emergency.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 4, line 6, after the word "force" insert the words "and the members of the fire department."

Page 4, line 8, after the word "police" insert the words "and the chief engineer of the fire department."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the salaries herein provided for shall be payable on and after July 1, 1924.

With the following committee amendment:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5855) to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force and the fire department of the District of Columbia, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BLANTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MUSCLE SHOALS.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules on House Resolution 169 for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 169, for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 518.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

The resolution is as follows:

House Resolution 169.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R.

518. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 10 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the acting chairman and some member of the Military Affairs Committee opposed to this bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall arise and report the bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

PREVENTION OF VENEREAL DISEASES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 491) for the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 30 minutes, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 30 minutes, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question now is on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 491) for the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 491) for the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with Mr. CHINDBLOM in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 491, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 491. For the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Kentucky 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before confining myself exclusively to the consideration of this bill I want to make a few observations upon the attitude of the membership of the House toward business presented to it by the District Committee and toward the District itself, especially as so many observations have been made along those lines in the debate on the previous bill.

I consider the personnel of this committee as high as that of any committee in this House when the purposes for which it is created are taken into consideration, and yet I regret to say that whenever any business is presented to this House by the District Committee most of the Members of the House immediately leave, and the business is subjected to criticism and facetiousness by those who remain.

A few moments ago some gentleman made the remark that he would follow the membership of this committee, and that was the first time I had ever heard such an indulgence presented and I was very much impressed by it.

Now, for the benefit of the House I will run over the membership of this committee. I desire to discuss the personnel of this committee.

The chairman of this committee is the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED], who was formerly State senator and secretary of state of West Virginia, and who in his State was prominent in educational work. He was a member of the international tax conference in 1909, and he has for seven years been active in District legislation.

The acting chairman of this committee is the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN], who was former president of the Maryland State Federation of Labor, active in manufacturing and real estate. He was formerly the leader of the senate of his State, and he has been active in District legislation for five years.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LAMPERT] is an active business man and has been active in District of Columbia legislation for seven years.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] was former commissioner of the city of St. Paul, has been active in the administration of city affairs there for several years, especially that phase of it dealing with public utilities. He has been active in legislation for the District of Columba.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] was a member of the Massachusetts Legislature for 10 years; is a manufacturer by business, has been in close touch with the city administration of Boston, and active in District affairs since a Member of Congress.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FITZGERALD] is a lawyer, war veteran, officer, and has been active in city affairs of the city of Dayton, in war veterans' associations, and District legislation since a Member of Congress.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD] is a lawyer, war veteran, former officer, and active in the city administration of the great city of Detroit.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] is a lawyer, former president of the State Senate of Vermont, war veteran, and banker.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEERS] is a lawyer and has been actively interested in banking and agriculture.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RATHBONE] is a lawyer, a former resident of this District, and now a Congressman at Large from the State of Illinois. He has been an active participant in the State and city administrations of his State and city, and has a splendid knowledge of the civic administration of Chicago.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. STALKER] is a banker, a manufacturer, and has been active in business affairs.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULLIVAN] is a resident of New York City; engaged in the real-estate business; has been active in the State senate of New York, especially in corporation legislation, public health, labor, and industry.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is a lawyer, has been on the bench, and has been active in District matters since being in Congress.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] was on the bench eight years before coming to Congress.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HAMMER] is a lawyer, active in educational affairs, former United States attorney, and has been active in District legislation since being in Congress.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. O'BRIEN] is a lawyer and judge, active, and acquainted with civic administration in Hudson County, N. J.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KUNZ] is a resident of Chicago, has been actively identified with the city administration of that great city, and interested in District legislation since being in Congress.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOST] is a former mayor of the great municipality of Kansas City and a lawyer by profession.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. GASQUE] has been active in educational affairs of his community, county superintendent of education, president of State Teachers and State County Superintendents' Association.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KENT] has been active in municipalities as attorney and counsel for municipalities in his State.

I run over this list for the purpose of assuring this House that for the purpose of civic administration I do not believe, former training and environment considered, the membership of this House could have been bettered in its selection than the committee that has been selected. So that I do not believe that the indifference which this House seems to pay to matters coming from the District Committee and concerning the District itself is directed at the personnel of that committee.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I have been very much interested in the history of the personnel of this committee which the gentlemen has given, but I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Is the record of these gentlemen, as disclosed by the Congressional Directory that the gentleman took this from, better or worse than the other Members of Congress? It is about the average, is it not?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes, I should say so; but I am pointing out that their former acquaintance with civic affairs and their training before coming to Congress fitted them peculiarly for their service on this committee.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. In point of fact, does the gentleman think there is a single Member of Congress who prior to coming to this House has not had equal experience?

Mr. GILBERT. I of course can not judge of that.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does not the gentleman think they are all qualified? Does the gentleman think there is a Member in the Congress, with the possible exception of the gentleman from Georgia, whose experience prior to coming to Congress is not such that he ought to be qualified to fill the position of a member of the city council of Washington?

Mr. GILBERT. I have the highest regard for the gentleman from Georgia and, of course, nothing I said was intended or could be construed as a reflection on the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I did not so take it, but I am speaking of the general membership of the House. Is not that true?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes; and I repeat that this committee, as compared with the general membership of the House, is entitled to consideration on matters presented by it to this Congress concerning the District of Columbia.

It is not a pleasant committee to serve upon. By being in proximity with the people for whom we are dealing, we are subject to importunities, and it is unquestionably one of the disagreeable committees to serve upon. I heard a Member of this House say the other day that a Member was entitled to sympathy who got on the District Committee, but if he stayed on it he deserved only censure.

The attitude of Congress to the District itself, in my opinion, is too often treated as the gentleman from Georgia, perhaps, showed a disposition to-day to treat the District and its matters, instead of being in the attitude of considering it a ward of Congress, treating it in a hostile attitude. I have heard from time to time Members rise on this floor and anything affecting the District or the District's welfare would be treated as if it were in opposition to the general conduct of the country itself.

Mr. LANKFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Does not the gentleman think that that condition really exists because the District of Columbia and the people of the District of Columbia insist more on securing appropriations than they do on giving real service in the way of law enforcement and protecting the lives of the Members of Congress and those who come here to live.

Mr. GILBERT. I will say to the gentleman that for over a century and a quarter, ever since the Constitution was adopted, the District of Columbia has been the ward of Congress, subject to its exclusive control, and if there is any wrong existing in the District of Columbia, Congress itself is to blame.

Mr. LANKFORD. Does not the gentleman see more in the newspapers urging appropriations than the gentleman sees in the papers urging law enforcement and the protection of the rights of the people living here?

Mr. GILBERT. Oh, it is, of course, human nature to want all they can get, and it is the duty of the gentleman who has just taken his seat, and all other gentlemen, to protect the country; and it is also their duty at the same time to realize that this is their city.

It was the dream of Washington, of Jefferson, and of the framers of the Constitution that this city should grow up not only the center of beauty but the center of wealth, refinement, culture, education, and art; and I am informed by the gentleman who is the chairman of the Library Committee [Mr. LUCE], a gentleman in position to know, that there are to-day in Washington, making their homes here, more scientific men than in any other city in the world; and Congress, while dealing fairly with the country at large, should, I feel, be imbued with those same ideals that were fostered by the founders of this Republic when they set aside this District not as a city for the people of Washington to live in so much but as the home of the President, the home of Congress, and the official home of 110,000,000 of people and not alone of the 437,000 people who live within its borders.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana and Mr. LANKFORD rose.

Mr. GILBERT. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman's trend of thought, but does the gentleman intend a little later to come to a discussion of the bill itself, because I want to ask some questions about that?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes; right now.

Mr. LANKFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Does not the gentleman think the very fact that Washington and our forefathers had such a lofty ideal for the city of Washington authorizes us to now beg for and plead for the enforcement of law in the District of Columbia and for a better observance of the rights of the people living here?

Mr. GILBERT. To get to a discussion of this particular bill, if there is any legislation that is needed, according to the opinion of military and medical circles, it is the bill before you. Within the last few years the people have realized that venereal disease is more prevalent than tuberculosis. It is more insidious than cancer. As a result, practically every State in the United States has passed a bill similar to but not identical with the bill we have before us.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is what I want to ask about. I have read the provisions of the bill and it seems to me they are unusually drastic. I note the statement in the report that a number of the States have adopted laws, and I wondered if any State had adopted a law which had the provisions of this law which gives the right to the health officer to examine any individual person and see whether he is afflicted with the disease.

Mr. GILBERT. I will come to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana and say, not only yes, but more drastic than is provided by this bill. When our boys were inducted into the service of the United States it is astounding to know that between 27 and 28 per cent were afflicted with a venereal disease to a distinguishable extent. That of itself shows the necessity for this legislation. We had several bills presented and chief among them was the bill presented by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER]. It was on the discussion of that bill that this bill was produced. I am not the champion of this character of legislation. We realized that we were going far contrary to the liberties and privacies of people in legislation of this kind by reason of the fact that this disease is different from diseases of general contagion and infection; but we did not go so far as many of the laws of the other States provide.

The bill of the gentleman from California was similar to most of the laws in operation in various States, but the committee thought that while a man had no compunction in informing the authorities that he was afflicted with a contagious disease and seeking its prevention or cure, such as typhoid or diphtheria, that this character of disease carried with it a condition of odium. No sensible man will report to any health authorities that he is afflicted with venereal disease, because, as I say, it immediately subjects him to the suspicion of immorality. So it is to be dealt with very carefully and frequently the very privacies of people, in order to get effective legislation, have to be invaded.

I assure the gentleman from Indiana and the members of the committee that this bill goes into that matter more delicately and to less extent than any bill that I have seen from any State in the Union, and I have examined most of them.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I call attention particularly to section 5, which provides that it shall be the duty of the health officer or some physician authorized to practice medicine in the District of Columbia when directed by the health officer to make examination of persons whom the health officer believes and has reasonable grounds to believe is afflicted with these diseases. He does that regardless of what the person may say. He can not make the examination over the objection of the person, but if he does object the officer can file an affidavit that he believes it and have a trial on the question of examination. It seems to me that that is pretty strong law.

Mr. GILBERT. Other States in the Union go further than that and provide that if the health officer on information believes that a person is so afflicted, they can be examined then and there. In order to prevent the health officer from unduly interfering with the rights of an individual, we provide that he can not make the examination until he appears before the court and has a rule showing cause for the party to appear, and then they must appear. The purpose of that is to insure that the health officer will not make a frivolous and fictitious complaint. The law is that if the person in good faith does not believe he has venereal disease, he can on a writ of habeas corpus require the reasonable grounds to be submitted to the court itself. To that extent this bill is less drastic than other States. These laws have been upheld as to their constitutionality and have been found necessary by the court in the regulation of public health. The constitutionality of the law has been upheld in many cases, three of which I have before me. There is one in the One hundred and eightieth Pacific Reporter, page 644; there is one in the State of California; one case from Oklahoma; one from Texas, that I have here. In fact, gentlemen, realizing the seriousness of this matter I have reports upholding the constitutionality of every clause in this bill.

Under the Raker bill, which is similar to the laws of most States of the Union, when one goes to the drug store for medicine for this disease he must give his name and address for a record to the druggist whereby the drug store will have the record that this person is so afflicted. In this bill we tried to provide so strongly for the rights of the individual that his misfortune can not be made public unless he has violated the rules of the health officer or his own physician in charge.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. It is provided in section 3 as follows:

SEC. 3. That the report herein required shall state in writing the disease from which the person is suffering, his name, age, sex, color, occupation, marital state, and address.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And also on the top of page 3 there is the same requirement.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. It seems to me that you are exposing a man instead of protecting him.

Mr. GILBERT. But the gentleman overlooks where that health report is. That is not in a drug store, but that is in the health department, and then not in there until he has first violated the regulations of the department itself or of his own family physician. Under the other bills and the laws prevalent in most of the States of the Union that becomes a public record, whether he is guilty of any misconduct or not. Under the provisions of this bill that can not be recorded, and that report is not sent in until he has first violated the instructions of the health officers.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Let me then ask this question: In the first section it is provided that the chief administrative officer of every penal institution "in which or in attendance upon which there is a person having syphilis," and so forth. That appears to me as I understand the language that he may report anybody who might happen to be even in attendance there as a witness. What does the gentleman mean by that language?

Mr. GILBERT. The gentleman brings out the provisions of the bill by his questions.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. It may include somebody who just simply happened to be attending there.

Mr. GILBERT. While the statement I just made, that he must first violate some regulations provided for his own protection, applies to practically all of the population, this bill necessarily makes an exception of those already in some penal institution. Let me read the provision:

That every chief administrative officer of every penal institution in which or in attendance upon which there is a person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall immediately upon becoming aware of that fact report the circumstances to the health officer as hereinafter provided.

It was my thought, whether it meets with the opinion of this committee or not, that a person already in some penal institution would not be seriously affected if it developed that he was at the same time suffering from some venereal disease, and that became necessary by reason of an incident which happened in this very town. It appears from the police court record in this town that many soldiers were infected at the same place. The proof showed that they had become infected with this venereal disease by going to the same house, and although the authorities knew where it was they were helpless to take any steps to prevent its spread.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Do I understand from what the gentleman says that there is a bawdy house maintained in the city of Washington? Why, I thought they were abolished years ago.

Mr. GILBERT. I mean to say only that the proof showed that these soldiers had gone to one house and had become infected with this disease. The gentleman can draw his own deduction in respect to the character of this house.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Does the gentleman not think that the provisions of this bill are such that it will be used to humiliate people and actually interfere with domestic relations? Suppose a man's wife should get the notion that he is unfaithful. Under the provisions of this bill she could go out and report him and say to the police, "I want you to take my husband out in the alley and examine him." Is not that possible under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. GILBERT. I say that the gentleman is totally ignorant of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I would like to have the gentleman convince me that he was not also ignorant as to its effect in the introduction of it, and discuss it so that he can enlighten me if that is not a sensible deduction to draw from it. Will the gentleman show me that is not possible? I know that I am very ignorant, but I think I compare favorably with the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GILBERT. Oh, the gentleman is not ignorant; he is of very high standing; but I say and repeat that he is ignorant of the provisions of this bill, and I confine that statement simply to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Is not that possible under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. GILBERT. It is not.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Why?

Mr. GILBERT. Because if the gentleman will turn to section 5 he will see that it is not. First let me point out to the gentleman from Georgia that if he had any knowledge about legislation on venereal diseases——

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Oh, let us not talk so much of my lack of knowledge.

Mr. GILBERT. I decline to yield further to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. The gentleman will find it is a little more pleasant if he will simply answer the question.

Mr. GILBERT. Legislation provided in all of the States of the Union is subject to the criticism of the gentleman from Georgia. The Raker bill introduced here does so provide, and for fear that somebody might use this to have some employee even of the board of health, which the Raker bill provides, make this examination, for fear that some police officer, as suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, might have some ulterior motive in examining somebody, or some member of the health department might not act in good faith, I have provided by section 5 of the bill, which protects the individual more than the law of any State of the Union, that it shall be the duty of the chief health officer—not even of an employee—to make this examination, and no law of the United States on this subject gives that much protection. Nobody, not even in the health department, can make this examination except the health officer, and who else? Some employee or policeman or agent or governmental clerk? Oh, no. It must be some physician authorized to practice medicine in the District of Columbia and directed by the health officer.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. He has the examination just the same.

Mr. GILBERT. The health officer and some physician directed by the health officer alone has this in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every chief administrative officer of every penal institution in which or in attendance upon which there is a person having syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid shall immediately upon becoming aware of that fact report the circumstances to the health officer as hereinafter provided.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would not make this motion to strike out the enacting clause were I not satisfied in my own mind that this bill not only ought not to pass in its present form, but that it can not be made in Committee of the Whole into such a bill as we should pass. I say that with great respect for the distinguished gentleman who is the author of the bill, who has made a study of this question and is earnest in his desire to cure a great evil in the District.

May I have unanimous consent for 10 minutes on this?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. With the understanding, of course, that I shall desire about five or six minutes to answer the gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman is entitled to it.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be done without unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall want at least five minutes to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, what is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. That he may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I am in favor of that, but I would like to make the suggestion, Mr. Chairman, that there ought to be a little more time allowed under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana that he shall have 10 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to have the attention of the committee while I make an analysis of this bill. There are parts of it which are absolutely out of keeping with good legislation.

Section 2 provides that when any person is brought before the judge of the juvenile court or a judge of any court for trial and investigation and the judge believes or has reasonable ground to believe that any such person is afflicted with syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid, he shall immediately report said fact to the health officer. If the person is brought before the judge for drunkenness, the judge immediately reports to the health officer that he believes the person is afflicted with one of these venereal diseases, and the report shall give his name. Then the health officer "shall use every available means to ascertain the existence of and to investigate all cases of syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid of which they have or may receive information and to ascertain the sources of such infection."

That is the provision of section 4. Then section 5 provides that it shall be the duty of the health officer or some other physician to make examination of all persons who the health officer believes or has reasonable ground to believe is afflicted with any of these diseases, but it says the examination can not be made if the person objects, unless he has an order of court.

You might think they would have a right of trial. But section 6 provides that whenever a person suspected refuses to submit to said examination it is the duty of the health officer to file an affidavit before any judge of the police court or the judge of any court having criminal jurisdiction. Thereupon the judge, without trial or any hearing whatever, shall issue an order and name the time and the place, and the person must appear and be examined or be punished for contempt.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Section 3, if I understand that section, means when he comes before this judge here the report is made down to the Public Health Service, he giving his name, occupation, and age, and everything else?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. That first part refers to persons in penal institutions or persons convicted. But this part that I am talking about refers to every person in the District. When the health officer believes that any person is afflicted with any of these diseases, he must submit to an examination, or a report is made to the judge, and the judge must order, and the judge names the time and place for examination. If the person does not come there for the examination, he is in contempt of court and can be fined or imprisoned, but it does not say definitely what the punishment shall be.

Now, let us trace this on down. Section 8 provides that the health officer must quarantine anyone suffering from this disease.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Is that disease as serious as measles or scarlet fever practically, or something of that kind that is quarantined? Why should it not be quarantined?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. All right, if the gentleman believes in it. I am simply pointing out what it does. Then in section 11—listen to this provision—no person can purchase medicine at a drug store to cure the disease. You have got to get a prescription from a physician, and no drug store can sell any of the medicines that can be used for the cure of these diseases. It also provides that no person can get a prescription filled unless he has a doctor's prescription, and it must be the prescription of a doctor in the District of Columbia. You can not go out into Maryland and there get a doctor's prescription and fill it here. It must be a doctor authorized to practice medicine in the District of Columbia.

Then the thirteenth provision provides that he shall be isolated. Mr. Chairman, I could go on and analyze the remainder of these provisions, and there are 21 of them; but time will not permit.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. What does that mean?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It does not say that if a doctor thinks a person is afflicted with gonorrhœa and should be quarantined it shall be done, but it says the health officer must quarantine everyone afflicted with that disease. And then, in section 21, there is a provision that any person who violates any of the provisions of this act shall, on conviction thereof, be punished for the first offense by a fine not exceeding $100, and for the second or any subsequent offenses by a fine not exceeding $300, or by imprisonment in the workhouse for not exceeding 30 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I do not want you to understand that I do not realize that you have a great evil to deal with. You have, but the liberties of our people are entitled to more consideration than is given in this bill. This bill goes further than any measure I have ever seen.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman know about the law in his own State of Indiana?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; I do not know that I do.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman's own State law is more drastic and does not give the protection to the unfortunate that this bill does.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that I do not think the law as written in Indiana is like this, but if it does not more carefully guard the rights of the individual than this bill does it is not of much value.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Is it not a fact that the State acts referred to have had written into them many of the odious things to which the gentleman has called attention, and thereby have become a practical nullity and scarcely any attention is paid to them?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know, but I do know this: That throughout this country men are not quarantined on account of having the diseases mentioned here; they are not quarantined while this bill says they shall be; throughout the country they do purchase medicines from the drug stores for the cure of these diseases, but this bill says no man shall do so.

Mr. KELLER. I think the gentleman is mistaken as far as quarantine is concerned, if he will read the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have read that provision.

Mr. GILBERT. The gentleman is right in using the word quarantine, but the committee investigated that pretty carefully, and quarantine, as the committee understood it, means any degree of quarantine, which simply may be, as provided and permitted in this bill, an admonition by the doctor to stay in the house, or in the case of school children the quarantine might permit them to do certain labor but not to go to school. Quarantine is a very broad term as construed by the courts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Everybody knows what quarantine means, and here is the language:

> That the chief health officer is authorized and directed—
> It is not within his discretion, but he is directed—> to order the quarantine of any person who is found under the provisions of this act to have—

Any one of these diseases. Now, it has not been very many months since we sent a similar bill back to the committee on a motion to recommit or strike out the enacting clause.

This measure will never pass in the House of Representatives; unless you make some provision that will be helpful you will never have this sort of a law on the statute books of the United States.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I call the gentleman's attention to section 16 for the purpose of asking whether or not, in his judgment, that section could be uniformly enforced?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Why, certainly not. That thing would be impossible.

Section 16 reads:

> That every physician practicing medicine in the District of Columbia shall report to the health officer within 10 days any case of syphilis, gonorrhea, or chancroid which he has been employed to treat, but said report shall be used for statistical purposes and shall in no event disclose the identity of the person so treated except under the conditions in this act provided.

Certainly it is impossible to enforce that.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I will ask the gentleman with reference to section 14.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There are so many provisions, and I have only reached the high places and pointed out the reason why this ought not to be passed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the only trouble about most of our criminal laws is that in legislatures they are largely framed to protect the rights of criminals instead of the rights of the law-abiding people.

And so it is with laws concerning immoral actions not constituting crime. We think more of protecting the one guilty of immorality than of protecting the innocent public suffering because of it. We have laws with reference to all contagious diseases—scarlet fever, for instance, which is now prevailing over Washington—and those laws provide that when a member of a family takes it they must segregate themselves, in the interest of the good of society, from the body politic. To protect the whole instead of the few they have to go to many inconveniences; they have to go through certain performances in having their furniture and clothing fumigated and their houses fumigated when the disease is over; all for the protection of society.

I am not thinking so much about the protection of the unfortunate individuals who are spoken of in this bill as I am of society. I am thinking more of the womanhood of the land, the young girls of our country and the young manhood not yet contaminated than I am the ones we are now restricting.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BOX. I do not suppose there will be any disagreement about the desire to protect society, but I am wondering how the gentleman feels about the power that this bill gives to officials, or to others vested with this power, to abuse it in its exercise and the degree to which it subjects men to abuse who should not be subjected to it.

Mr. BLANTON. I catch the gentleman's point and I will try to answer it. This bill is designed to protect society against an individual who has a loathsome disease which he does not make public.

He does not advertise it. He keeps it a secret to himself. You have got to have some kind of restriction in such a case if you protect society. This bill was framed by a man who has had much experience in law matters, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT]. He was formerly a distinguished judge on the bench. He is its author. The gentleman from Kentucky has spent much time in its preparation. The committee, composed of some lawyers and some laymen, took it under consideration and thrashed it over. In that committee there were several bills of this nature pending. There were some, more drastic, far beyond the provisions of this bill. The committee thrashed all out with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] and with members of the committee and agreed upon this measure. I know it does place some restrictions on certain individuals. There should be such restrictions placed upon them. Why should there not be? Why should they not report such a matter to their family physician? That is all it requires them to do. It requires them to report to their family physician, just like they would if they had scarlet fever, and why should they not do that?

Mr. WOLFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOLFF. Will it prevent these men who are working as orderlies out at Walter Reed and who have this same disease from serving and handling the food out there?

Mr. BLANTON. It provides they shall report it immediately to some physician, who would then use precautions to protect others. As it is now they do not have to do that. They can continue to do the very thing the gentleman says they are doing, but if you pass this bill they have got to report it to some physician—their family physician of their own choosing. He does not make the matter public. It is kept within his own breast and his own bosom as the physician of the individual.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. If I understand the provisions of this bill, he can not go to a drug store here in the city of Washington and procure a prescription?

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad my colleague asked that question.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Wait a moment. Let me finish the question. But there is nothing in this bill that prohibits him from going across the line over into Maryland and into any drug store across the line and getting all the medicine he wants.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad my colleague from Georgia mentioned that because that is one of the main reasons for the passage of this bill. Let a young boy unfortunately contract a bad disease and he will not go to a doctor, when if he would go to a doctor he could be relieved in a week or ten days.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for two minutes more to answer the gentleman, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Instead of going to a good physician he will sneak around to a drug store and get some kind of cheap patent medicine that is well advertised, and the first thing you know all the doctors in the land can not cure him. What he wants is expert medical advice, and expert medical treatment, and if it were my boy I would want him to go to a doctor and to the best doctor he could get. If it was my colleague's boy, he would want him to go to a doctor. He would not want him to go to a drug store around the corner and buy some 25-cent box of patent medicine that would do him more harm, possibly, than if he did not take it. That is the very purpose of this bill, to prevent it.

We ought not to get scared because our friend from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] has moved to strike out the enacting clause. We do not have to strike it out. This is not a matter that has been brought before the House hurriedly. It is a matter that your District Committee—as one member of it, I will say—for several years has had under consideration, and I think every member of the District Committee that has been on it any length of time has had this matter before him for years and has been giving it careful consideration. I hope my colleagues will not get disturbed about some little restriction that is placed around individuals that ought to have restrictions placed around them. I think we ought to pass this bill; and I think if my colleague from Georgia knew the full necessity of it, he would be the strongest advocate on the floor here fighting for it.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. What about section 11 as to advertisements of medicines?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think they ought to be advertised, concerning these particular diseases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] be given five minutes on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I do not want to object and shall not object, but I think there ought also to be given a little opportunity for other gentlemen to be heard who desire to strike out the enacting clause. I think we ought to have a free discussion of this matter. This is a pretty big question. I certainly want to hear the gentleman from Kentucky, but let it be with the understanding that the gentleman from Maryland will not oppose other gentlemen being heard.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to modify my request by asking that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] have five minutes and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN] have five minutes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I wish the gentleman would ask for 10 minutes additional so that other gentlemen can also discuss the matter.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No one else has asked for such an opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the debate on the motion to strike out the enacting clause be extended 10 minutes, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT] to have five minutes, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN] to have five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILBERT. Gentlemen of the committee, I want to reiterate that my connection with this bill was not by any reason of any personal desire on my part to advance any legislation whatever. I was simply on the subcommittee to which was referred all of these different bills, and as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has said, we considered this matter all through the last Congress.

We have considered the laws of many States dealing with this subject. We have consulted the health authorities all over the United States, and not only during the last Congress but during this Congress. After our deliberation the committee unanimously came to the conclusion that this bill should be presented because, more than any bill that was presented to the committee and more than the law of any State in the Union, it preserved the privacies and individual rights of the individuals. Of course, the subject itself is such that to a certain extent the privacies of the people must be invaded, and the only question you have to determine, in my opinion, is whether or not the prevalence and character of the disease is such that for the protection of the boys and girls and the innocent public, these rights should be given up by those who are reasonably suspected by the health officer in whom we should have confidence.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Do you claim this power under the police power of the State?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes; under the police power.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. You believe, then, that under the police power you can deprive the accused of the right to trial?

Mr. GILBERT. I will say to the gentleman from Utah that it goes to this extent: Of course, you can not deprive him of that right if he cares to take out a writ of habeas corpus. He is then entitled to have it determined on the merits of whether or not the health officer has reasonable ground to believe that he is so afflicted. That has been determined and I can give the gentleman the decision upholding that position.

There is one more thing I want to bring out and then I am through.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GILBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I think we are all agreed upon doing everything possible to protect not only the afflicted but the innocent. The thing that appeals to me is whether this bill does not have in it grave danger of having innocent persons wrongfully accused of something which would hold them up to shame in the community.

Mr. GILBERT. To a certain extent it does and necessarily must put great powers in the health officer, I would say to the gentleman from Utah. It enables him to say whether or not he has reasonable grounds to believe that this person is so afflicted.

Now, I want to answer the gentleman's suggestion as to the right to buy this medicine. All the medical authorities agree that this disease, more than any other disease known to the human body, requires individual treatment. What would be beneficial to a disease in its incipiency would not be beneficial to one in the advanced stages, and by the application of a nostrum it was shown that a person who was afflicted in its incipiency took a prescription for one in the advanced stages and became totally blind.

It is not a pleasant thing to talk about; but whenever you go to the water-closet you find a little circular placed on the door, "Go to the drug store and get a prescription No. so-and-so" or "Call for so-and-so," and that is plastered all over this country. Of course, I do not know, but the medical authorities agree that it is absolutely disastrous in its effect. It was for that purpose, and for that purpose only, that we incorporated in the bill that they must have a prescription from a physician, so that they would be assured that cases would get individual treatment. That provision of the bill has been upheld as constitutional and salutary by three different high courts of this country.

As to the wisdom of this legislation and this particular bill, I want to say that I have letters of recommendation from the United States Social Hygiene Board; I have them from the medical department of the Army approving this bill. I have it from civic workers throughout the United States. This bill protects the citizens that do not have this disease from its terrific ravages.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there are several provisions in the bill to which I can not subscribe. Take, for instance, section 11. It says:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to advertise within the District of Columbia any medicine or remedy, by number of prescriptions or otherwise, for the treatment, cure, or prevention, etc.

I can understand very well that certain classes of men would favor a provision like that in legislation. There is probably not a doctor practicing in the city that would object to it. But, gentlemen, it is not every man in this country that is practicing medicine that knows all about it. There are many men who have sense enough to put up prescriptions that doctors themselves recommend. If we want to do something radical, why not regulate the trade; why not regulate the druggists; why not provide that the druggist who is known to sell medicines, patent or otherwise, unfit for this specific purpose for which recommended shall be punished? Why say that a man shall not advertise? I do not believe that is legal.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KENT. Has the gentleman ever seen an advertisement designed to foster the sale of medicine for the prevention or cure of diphtheria or scarlet fever?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I do not know that I have, but I assume that there are such instances.

Mr. KENT. The gentleman would not approve of advertisements of that kind?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I would if they were good remedies. I would not try to prevent them by legislation if they were good remedies. I think if my child had diphtheria or scarlet fever I would want to get a doctor to prescribe for it, but that is no reason why I would object to an advertisement of a remedy which was thought to be efficient or which other men said was efficient.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose a physician should determine that the taking of a patent medicine would result in death in most cases in scarlet fever and diphtheria, would the gentleman stop the advertisement of that patent medicine?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I do not believe that the doctors think anybody is going to get killed in this way.

Mr. BLANTON. But the consensus of most of the doctors is that these boys ought to go to a physician.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Oh, yes; but the very thing you are doing will prevent his going to a doctor. Under section 13 you say that he shall be isolated. The boy knows that if he goes to a doctor he will be isolated. He will say, "Oh, yes; John Smith was a fool, he went to a doctor and he is out here in quarantine, and I won't go." The result may be that the boy will walk around and die of the disease. Why, gentlemen, I have seen some politicians walk around straddling on issues. They have straddled so long until they walk straddle legged. If you enact the proposed law, before long they will be up before some health officer for examination. [Laughter.]

Why should we want to do such a foolish thing? I assume that the persons coming within the provisions of the bill would be isolated according to the disease with which they may be afflicted. Therefore you must have at least three quarantine stations. What funds do you provide for them? How long are they to be kept in quarantine? Do you know what this bill would cost, have you figured it up, can you calculate it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 10, noes 15.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, if nobody else does it, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw that and call for tellers.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-five Members present; not a quorum.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CHINDBLOM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 491) for the prevention of venereal diseases in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 3, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

387. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting copy of letter from the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, dated February 4, 1924, describing certain valueless records which are no longer needed for use in connection with the transaction of public business, and have no permanent value or historical interest; to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

388. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924, to remain available until June 30, 1925, for the eradication of the foot-and-mouth and other contagious diseases of animals, $1,000,000 (H. Doc. No. 211); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 3, 1924.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we thank Thee for these days of brightness and of cheer, the harbingers of the good time near at hand, when winter shall be past and the sound of the singing of birds shall be heard in the land. We do ask Thee to give unto us strength of purpose and such ideals of devotion to duty that we may realize that we can make the world a happier and a better place in which to live; that we can add to its cheer and deliver many from its sorrow and gloom. The Lord our God help us continually. We humbly ask in Jesus' name. Amen.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, February 29, 1924, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Smith	Stephens	Warren

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5855) to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force and the fire department of the District of Columbia, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed enrolled bills of the following titles, and they were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 2583. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Bolling Wilson;

H. R. 4807. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of Louisiana to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across West Pearl River, in the State of Louisiana; and

H. R. 4808. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Pearl River between St. Tammany Parish, in Louisiana, and Hancock County, in Mississippi.

PROSECUTION OF CLAIMS AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT BY EX-OFFICIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, and will ask the Secretary to read it. The Chair calls it to the attention of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The reading clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 1, 1924.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: This department has received Senate Resolution 176, passed February 26, 1924, directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish the Senate certain information.

In order to fully comply with said resolution, it is requested that this department be furnished with the names of all ex-Members of the United States Senate, together with the dates of their leaving office, who will come within the provisions of Senate Resolution 176.

It is requested that this data be forwarded at the earliest practicable date.

Very truly yours,

EDWIN DENBY,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand the reading of the letter, the Secretary of the Navy wants the Senate to supply him with the names of ex-Senators who will come within the provisions of the resolution. That information is accessible to the Secretary of the Navy I should think.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, we can not hear what the Senator is saying.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senate heard the reading of the letter; there has been a great deal of commotion in the Senate. The Secretary of the Navy has asked the Senate, as I understand the reading of the letter, to supply him with the names of ex-Senators who would come within the provisions of the resolution which we passed a few days ago asking for certain information. I was stating that the names of ex-Senators are accessible to anyone, I think, who would take a Congressional Directory and look them up. However, in order to get the question settled, I move that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to supply the Secretary of the Navy with the names of ex-Senators who will come within the provisions of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to supply the Secretary of the Navy with the names of the ex-Senators referred to in the communication of the Secretary of the Navy.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have received a number of petitions, one from letter carriers with headquarters at Texarkana, Ark., and other postal employees operating out of Texarkana, a number of similar communications from carriers and other postal employees of Searcy and Fort Smith, Ark., and still others at Eldorado, Ark., urging the passage of the bill (H. R. 7016) reclassifying the salaries of postmasters and employees and readjusting their compensation on an equitable basis.

I am informed that a subcommittee of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate and a subcommittee of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives are now sitting jointly for the consideration of the bill and measures of a similar character. I present the petitions and ask that they may be referred to the special subcommittee of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is chairman.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the petitions will be so referred.

Mr. BURSUM. I present a number of petitions and letters relating to the transportation act, the first page of each of which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, and I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the petitions and letters were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and the first pages thereof were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAS VEGAS-SAN MIGUEL COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
East Las Vegas, N. Mex., February 26, 1924.

Hon. H. O. BURSUM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR HONORABLE: We are herewith inclosing a copy of resolutions touching on railroads and transportations, which were recently passed by our chamber of commerce.

We would ask that these resolutions receive your consideration.

With very kind wishes, we remain,

Respectfully yours,

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By THOMAS A. JOHNSEN, President.

Resolution adopted by the Las Vegas and San Miguel County Chamber of Commerce.

Whereas the Las Vegas and San Miguel County Chamber of Commerce has had under consideration matters pertaining to railroad transportation, as the same affects not only our immediate community, county, and State, but also the United States at large; and

Recognizing that commercial and industrial development and prosperity is contingent upon adequate transportation facilities, which in turn are contingent upon healthy competitive operation and reasonable dictation by regulating and legislative bodies of political groups; and

It appearing that the railroads of the country in good faith are borrowing and expending large sums of money in the repair of equipment, the purchase of new equipment, and in the increase of trackage and other facilities in an endeavor to recover from abnormal operation and under war conditions and to care for a greatly increasing volume of traffic; and that the railroads of the country have formulated and are progressing with policies of rehabilitation under the present transportation act of Congress, which should at least be given a fair and impartial trial; and

Whereas in a time of large prospective volume of business there is liable to be a shortage of cars which may bring about dissatisfaction among some shippers in the country and also a demand from some political groups for further legislation by the Government and thus possibly toward honest efforts on the part of the railroads to give and maintain adequate service to our community and country and promote the resources; and

Whereas the Government should not adopt a policy which would result in a confiscation of the business institutions of the country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Las Vegas and San Miguel County Chamber of Commerce of Las Vegas, N. Mex., That it hereby declares its confidence in the railroad companies and the good faith and ability of the railroads in the manner in which they are endeavoring to carry out their policies in handling the complex transportation situation of the country, and that this chamber believes that the said railroads should be given full opportunity of developing and carrying out their policies in regard to such matters and under the transportation laws as they now exist: Be it further

Resolved, That this chamber is opposed to any policies on the part of regulating and legislative bodies which will tend to destroy healthy, competitive operation and development of the railroads of the country or make necessary or toward Government ownership of the railroads: Be it further

Resolved, That this chamber lend whatever assistance it may toward developing wholesome cooperation between shippers and the public and the railroads to insure fair treatment to all parties and the most effective utilization of the transportation systems; and that we urge other commercial organizations to take a like action, and that copies of these resolutions be sent to our Senators and Congressman.

Adopted by the board of directors February 6, 1924, Las Vegas-San Miguel County Chamber of Commerce.

THOMAS A. JOHNSEN, President.
W. W. PHILLIPS, Secretary.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., February 11, 1924.

Hon. H. O. BURSUM,
Senator from State of New Mexico,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am attaching hereto, for your consideration, a petition which explains itself, signed by 52 supervisors of mechanics, Albuquerque shops, roundhouse, and repair yards of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., at Albuquerque.

These men have made a study of railroad work and have devoted practically their entire lives to railroad service, and by reason of their ability and understanding of conditions on the railroads of this country have been selected to head the various departments and branches at Albuquerque.

Their opinion and judgment in matters pertaining to the betterment of conditions on this road is sought daily by the management and will no doubt be of benefit to you and your colleagues in determining the position you will take when these matters come before Congress.

Yours respectfully, J. H. LEWIS,
President Santa Fe Supervisors' Association, Albuquerque Local.

PETITION TO OUR UNITED STATES SENATORS AND CONGRESSMAN IN REGARD TO THE TRANSPORTATION ACT, 1920.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., February 9, 1924.

Whereas we have noted in the daily press statements to the effect that the so-called progressives who are Members of the present Congress are in favor of repealing the transportation act, 1920, otherwise known as the Esch-Cummins bill; and

Whereas this act recognizes the rights of labor and for the first time in the history of our Government labor, organized or unorganized, was given a tribunal to which it might appeal in case of oppression; and

Whereas this tribunal, known as the Labor Board, has functioned to the satisfaction of all fair-minded elements of labor or capital; and

Whereas we know by experience the great harm that has been done in the industrial world by radical and unfair railroad legislation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the members of the Santa Fe Supervisors' Association of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway system, That we respectfully petition all Members of Congress, especially from our State, to vote against any substantial change in the transportation act, 1920; and be it further

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves and our families to do everything in our power to elect, regardless of party affiliations, men pledged to the support of this law.

SANTA FE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Santa Fe, N. Mex., February 16, 1924.

Hon. HUGH H. WILLIAMS,
Chairman State Corporation Commission,
care of United States Senator H. O. Bursum,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WILLIAMS: Some time ago, at the request of the traveling passenger agent of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., the Santa Fe Chamber of Commerce passed a resolution indorsing the transportation act in its entirety. After due consideration, the directors, realizing that they had not been fully advised in regard to the said act, called a special meeting and rescinded their previous action.

We desire to express our confidence in you, and know that you will do all you can to have certain amendments passed which will be beneficial to the people of this and other States. Wishing you success, I am,

Very truly yours,

EDGAR L. STREET,
President Santa Fe Chamber of Commerce.

WINSLOW, ARIZ., February 13, 1924.

Hon. H. O. BURSUM,
United States Senator from New Mexico, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am herewith attaching a petition signed by the Association of Shop Crafts, at Gallup, N. Mex., asking that you vote against any substantial change in the transportation act of 1920.

Yours truly,

R. C. ABELL.

O. B. A., of Norwich, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnson selective immigration bill, as being discriminatory, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BROOKHART, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1643) for the relief of Samuel S. Archer, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 197) thereon.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, submitted a report (No. 198) to accompany the bill (S. 1499) to promote the safety of passengers and employees upon railroads by prohibiting the use of wooden cars under certain circumstances, heretofore reported by him with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report (No. 199) to accompany the resolution (S. Res. 124) directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to secure information relative to amount of money expended for the purpose of creating public interest favorable to railroad sentiment, heretofore reported by him with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. DIAL:

A bill (S. 2710) to finance the exportation of American agricultural products and raw materials; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NORRIS. I introduce a bill at the request of the Department of Agriculture, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 2711) for the relief of the Pitt River Power Co.; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NORRIS. The title of the bill would indicate that it ought to go to the Committee on Claims, but I find upon reading the bill that its subject matter is such that it clearly ought to go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 2712) to prohibit the collection of a surcharge for the transportation of persons or baggage in connection with the payment for parlor or sleeping car accommodations; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2713) to provide for the promotion of physical education in the United States through cooperation with the States in the preparation and payment of supervisors and teachers of physical education, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 2714) for the relief of John F. Malley; and

A bill (S. 2715) for the relief of John F. Malley; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 2716) granting a pension to Seledon Jaramillo; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2717) for the relief of Joseph H. Wilson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2718) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the Government of Norway on account of losses sustained by the owners of the Norwegian steamship Hassel as the result of a collision between that steamship and the American steamship Ausable; and

A bill (S. 2719) to authorize the payment of an indemnity to the British Government on account of losses sustained by the owners of the British steamship Baron Berwick as the result of a collision between that vessel and the U. S. S. Iroquois (now Freedom) and a further collision with the U. S. destroyer Truxtun; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. WELLER:

A bill (S. 2720) for the relief of Charles S. Cook;

A bill (S. 2721) for the relief of Levin P. Kelly; and

A bill (S. 2722) for the relief of Levin P. Kelly; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FERRIS:

A bill (S. 2723) granting a pension to Frank Truman Perrigo (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 2724) granting a pension to Cal Hopson; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2725) for the relief of Edward E. Kemp; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 2726) granting a pension to Frieda Kyle Read; to the Committee on Pensions.

CHANNEL OF GILA RIVER, GRAHAM COUNTY, ARIZ.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 966) for the continuance of construction work on the San Carlos Federal irrigation project in Arizona, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PROPOSED NITRATE PLANT ON COLUMBIA RIVER, WASH.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 518) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to sell to Henry Ford nitrate plant No. 1, at Sheffield, Ala.; nitrate plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Waco Quarry, near Russellville, Ala.; and to lease to the corporation to be incorporated by him Dam No. 2 and Dam No. 3 (as designated in H. Doc. No. 1262, 64th Cong., 1st sess.), including power stations when constructed as provided herein, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

EULOGY ON THE LATE PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a eulogy delivered by Mr. Pattangall, of Maine, on Woodrow Wilson. The request to have this done comes to me from Thomas F. O'Neil, of Portland, Me., a locomotive fireman of that State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOSES. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will withdraw the request, and read it into the RECORD this afternoon.

Mr. CARAWAY subsequently said:

Mr. President, I wish to renew a request for unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a speech of Mr. Pattangall in eulogy of the late President Woodrow Wilson, the request being made by Thomas F. O'Neil, of Portland, Me. I spoke to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who objected a minute ago, and there is no further objection as far as I know.

There being no objection, the eulogy was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Portland Press Herald, Portland, Me.]

WILSON "BELONGS TO THE AGES," DECLARES PATTANGALL IN EULOGY—IN HIS NAME MEN WILL DEDICATE LIVES TO HIS GREAT IDEALS—MEMORIAL SERVICE HELD AT AUGUSTA—BENEDICT F. MAHER, REPUBLICAN, ALSO PAYS TRIBUTE AT CITY HALL GATHERING.

STRIKING POINTS BY W. R. PATTANGALL IN HIS EULOGY OF WOODROW WILSON.

I speak of him now as I spoke of him when living. I place no flowers on his grave that I did not strew in his pathway when he trod the ways of men.

To me he stands supreme among all of those who have lived in my generation.

His life was a romance, impossible to have been lived in any country but our own.

All that he lacked was an intimate knowledge of the human beings with whose aid and in spite of whose opposition he was obliged to carry out his plans.

His place in history will be determined by his record as a great war statesman and a great war President.

And once having entered the war the great modern apostle of peace struck with the force of a thunderbolt.

The war ended and he sought to build upon the wreck of the world an edifice of lasting peace.

Those who should have stood by him and have fought the battle of humanity shoulder to shoulder with him failed him, and he who had reached the mountain top trod his sad way back to the valley.

He met their condemnation as he had met their praise—with steady gaze and bravest smile, weary and broken in the flesh, strong and upright in the spirit.

Men prayed for a leader and God gave him to them. For a time they followed, but as he led ever onward and ever upward the trailing marchers tired and fell back and the leader walked alone.

He lived to sound the height and depth.

He belongs to the ages.

Men said he failed. It was the failure of Calvary. The crucifix his, the crown of thorns, but life everlasting and glory for ever and ever.

AUGUSTA, ME., February 17.—Striking eulogies of the life and achievements of Woodrow Wilson were delivered this evening by William R. Pattangall, Democrat, and Benedict F. Maher, Republican, at a memorial service held in city hall.

The services were arranged by a group of women at the invitation of Mayor Ernest L. McLean, who presided. Clergymen from several of the churches assisted in the service, and there was music by an orchestra. Mr. Pattangall said:

"The high regard in which I held President Wilson while he lived, the reverence which I have for his memory, now that he has passed from earth, is difficult, if not impossible, to translate into language.

"I speak of him now as I spoke of him living. I place no flowers on his grave that I did not strew in his pathway when he trod the ways of men. I sing no praise of him now that he lies in the tomb that I did not sing both when he stood at the head of the Nation, at the height of his power, worshipped by the world, and when he lay broken and defeated in the sick room while his enemies cried his failure.

"To me he stands supreme among all of those who have lived in my generation. I can not speak of him excepting in superlatives. I can not even think of him in moderation.

"His life was a romance, impossible to have lived in any country but our own. The son of a clergyman, a quiet, thoughtful, studious youth, graduating from Princeton at 23, admitted to the practice of law at 25, giving up law to study and teach history and economics, he became president of his alma mater at the age of 46. As a writer he attracted the attention of public men, and after having presided for eight years over the great university, with which his name will always be identified, he was induced to enter active politics, and in 1910 was elected Governor of New Jersey, to be called to the Presidency of the United States two years later, where he served his country and the world for eight long, weary, glorious years.

"From a clergyman's home to school, from school to law office, from law office to a teacher's chair, from professorship to head of a university, then chief executive of the State of his adoption, then to the Presidency, and reelected to that great office, briefly resumes his wonderful career up to the time of the World War.

HIS TRAINING NOT POLITICAL.

"His training was not political in the ordinary use of the word. He had no legislative experience, no congressional experience, no record of party service, no intimate acquaintance with leaders, either of his own or the opposite party, when he became Governor of New Jersey, and only two years passed between his inauguration as governor and his inauguration as President.

"But he was a profound student of history and an expert economist. His trained mind, his knowledge of the experience of mankind, enabled him to approach the solution of the problems of government as a mathematician approaches the solution of problems in calculus.

"All that he lacked was an intimate knowledge of the human beings with whose aid and in spite of whose opposition he was obliged to carry out his plans.

"In his first term as President he devoted his time to domestic problems. During that period he was the means of placing in the statute books of our country laws which will remain for many years a monument to his capacity for practical statesmanship.

"Under him epoch-making advance was made in sound progressive legislation, not only in humanitarian and social welfare lines but in matters as well which pertained to business and finance and made for the ultimate prosperity of the Nation.

"Under him the business of government was carried on by the chosen representatives of the people and not by the self-selected representatives of special interests.

HIS AIM TO SERVE.

"An aristocrat in intellect, his heart was filled with love of the common people, and his whole aim was to serve them, not as a demagogue but as one who knew their needs better than they knew them themselves.

"Had the world remained at peace until his first term as President ended he might never have served his second term and might not have cared to do so; but in 1914 the mad ambition of the product of many royal intermarriages plunged Europe into the chaos of war, and he was called upon first to act as the chief spokesman of the neutral nations and later, when, in spite of his every endeavor, our own country and all the world was drawn into the maelstrom, as the leader of the forces that battled for the preservation of civilization.

"Essentially a man of peace, his name is so connected with the World War that his place in history will be determined rather by his record as a great war statesman and a great war President than by his achievements as an economist, splendid as were those achievements.

"His leadership of national thought from 1914 to 1917 was a marvel of patience and tact. Certain of our people desired our entrance into the war soon after it broke out. The whole Atlantic seaboard clamored for war when the crime of the Lusitania was perpetrated. He waited, guiding the national thought by the application to the situation of inexorable logic to a just conclusion until every section of the Nation was ready to respond to the call to arms.

"As a result, when war was declared the whole American people approved the declaration.

"There were Tories in the time of the Revolution; the Hartford convention resolved against war and in favor of secession in 1812; draft riots marred the patriotic record of the men of 1863; but so carefully, so patiently had Woodrow Wilson counseled with the people in 1915 and 1916 that when he called for war in 1917 there was no peace party to dispute the decision.

STRUCK WITH MIGHTY FORCE.

"And once having entered the war the great modern apostle of peace struck with the force of a thunderbolt. Under his direction the man power, the brain power, the money power, the hearts and conscience of all America were mobilized. When we entered the war the Allies were all but ready to acknowledge defeat. In 18 short months the greatest of conquering armies was humbled, the war lord of Germany had sought refuge in flight, the dream of world domination by a middle European empire was dissipated, and the nations which had conspired together against civilization joined in unconditional surrender.

"The war ended, and he sought to build upon the wreck of the world an edifice of lasting peace. He had reached the heights. For a few brief moments the nations listened to his words of wisdom and his plans for their future safety, then those who should have stood by him and have fought the battle of humanity shoulder to shoulder with them failed him, and he who had reached the mountain top trod his sad way back to the valley. He heard then the jeers of those who had cheered him loudest when he last went their way, and he met their condemnation as he had met their praise with steady gaze and bravest smile, weary and broken in the flesh, strong and upright in the spirit.

"Men prayed for a leader and God gave him to them. For a time they followed, but as he led ever onward and ever upward, the trailing marchers tired and fell back, and the leader walked alone.

HIS BROTHER'S KEEPER.

"A great man, philosopher, statesman, prophet, interpreter of democracy, companion for kings, he rested his faith in the multitude. He was his brother's keeper, and the burden that the weary toiler bore taxed his strength as though it were his own.

"Loved, worshipped, honored, trusted, hated, vilified, betrayed, he went his way unmoved by victory or defeat, conscious of his rectitude—sure of the verdict of history.

"Men called him cold. His heart was warm with love of all mankind. They charged him with ambition. He had no aim except the common good; no purpose save to serve his fellow men.

"He lived to sound the height and depth of life. He heard the crowd shout 'Hosanna' and heard them cry 'Crucify him.' Under the tremendous strain which he put upon his mental and physical energy his health broke down, and for months he lay stricken, unable to take part in the world's work.

THE WHOLE WORLD MOURNED.

"The people turned back to him toward the last and gave him their love, their tears, their prayers in place of the cheers and the applause they had given him in the earlier days. As time went on he became nearer and dearer to them, and when the end came the whole world mourned.

"Woodrow Wilson has passed into history now. He belongs to the ages. He will take his place with those whose lives mark milestones in mankind's progress. The world is better for his having lived, and so long as the English language is spoken, so long as the memory of this Nation endures, his fame will live, and in his name men will dedicate their lives to those great ideals which were his, and for which he worked and spoke and wrote and prayed, for which he lived, and for which he suffered and died.

"Men said he failed because he could not make blind partisanship see the vision he beheld. It was the failure of Calvary. The crucifix his, the crown of thorns, but life everlasting and glory forever and ever."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5855) to fix the salaries of officers and members of the Metropolitan police force and the fire department of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

INFORMATION FURNISHED BY THE ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senate has previously passed three resolutions asking for information from the Department of Justice and the Attorney General. The first resolution was Senate Resolution 73, which was submitted on December 17, 1923, by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], asking that the Attorney General be directed to report to the Senate the particulars and specifications of all cases transmitted to him by the Federal Trade Commission, and asking other information in relation to that subject.

The second resolution, being Senate Resolution 138, was adopted on February 1, 1924, having been introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. It directed the Attorney General to furnish information as to whether in cases involving persons or corporations charged with defrauding the Government in any war contract or contracts or the sale of surplus war material wherein both a civil and criminal liability is alleged or claimed the Department of Justice has made a settlement of the civil liability without prosecuting some of the defendants for criminal liability.

The third resolution, being Senate Resolution 139, was submitted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] on February 1, 1924, and directed the Attorney General to inform the Senate what disposition, if any, has been made of the million dollars appropriated for the prosecution of frauds against the Government growing out of war contracts, and also to report to the Senate the number of actions, if any, which have been brought to prosecute such fraud or to recover moneys due the Government, the status of each case, and particularly to report to the Senate what disposition has been made by the Attorney General of the case of the Government against the Wright-Martin Aircraft Co., of New York.

All these resolutions have been replied to at length by the Attorney General. I hold his replies in my hand. They were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. At a meeting of that committee this morning I was instructed to ask that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from the further consideration of these matters and that all the information furnished by the Attorney General in response to the resolutions which I have mentioned be referred to the special committee which the Senate has elected to investigate the Department of Justice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the several communications and reports made by the Attorney General to which he has referred and that they be referred to the special committee elected by the Senate for the investigation of the Department of Justice.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether the report which he has just made referred to two resolutions or only to the resolution to which the Senator last referred? I was out of the Chamber and did not hear the opening part of the Senator's statement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It referred to all three of the resolutions, Senate Resolution 73, Senate Resolution 138, and Senate Resolution 139, two of which resolutions were submitted by the Senator from Utah himself and the third by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether from the examination which has been made by the Committee on the Judiciary the conclusion was reached that none of those reports should be printed?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We did not consider that question. The Attorney General in the reports and the letters which accompany them suggested that he felt constrained, under the language of the Senate resolutions, to furnish the information at length, although he suggested there were certain portions which the department did not think, in the public interest, should be made public at present, referring more particularly to corporations and persons who had been investigated and found to be innocent and others who had been investigated and were to be prosecuted. He stated that he did not think in either case it would be in the public interest to divulge the names of such persons or corporations to the public.

The committee were not instructed by the Senate to select such portions of the communications as the Judiciary Committee might think ought to be made public, and, of course, the committee has no information as to which portions the department would desire to be made public. Therefore, inasmuch as the Senate has raised a special committee to investigate the entire Department of Justice and its officials, the committee thought that these matters came within the jurisdiction of that committee, and that that committee could decide, perhaps, better than could we what portions of the information should be made public and what portions should not.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if it is understood that the special committee referred to by the Senator from Connecticut will have the authority to determine whether these reports or any parts of them shall be printed, I shall make no objection to the request of the Senator, but if it means that these reports are to be buried with the committee or that the committee is not to have the authority to determine whether or not they are to be printed, then it seems to me that the Judiciary Committee should retain possession of these reports and should themselves make the investigation as to what portions of them should be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that I thought the Senate would see the point of view which I had; but, perhaps, I did not state it as clearly as I should have done.

A special committee has been raised by the Senate for the purpose of investigating the entire Department of Justice. In the preamble to the resolution raising that special committee are embraced certain whereases enumerating and involving the very matters upon which the Department of Justice has now furnished information. It seemed to me that it would save that committee an enormous amount of work and of examination if it had all this information submitted to it in advance in writing, and then the committee without making it public by cross-examination could decide what part of the information, in its opinion, ought to be kept private.

If the Judiciary Committee should be of the opinion that certain parts of it ought to be kept private and the special committee should be of the opinion that those parts ought to be made public, immediately a conflict of opinion and jurisdiction would arise over the same matter. It seemed to our committee that it was extremely desirable to put the special committee which has just been raised to investigate this department in possession of all the evidence the department has furnished us under previous resolutions, and that they would be probably more competent, in view of what else may come before them, to say what they wanted to make public. I think it would also be a great aid to that committee in determining what lines of inquiry to pursue rather than, without having a complete subject before them, to follow particular leads, so to speak, that might occur to them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the two resolutions in which I am particularly interested called for certain information. The first resolution called for information respecting the million dollars which was appropriated for the prosecution of the so-called war-fraud cases and for a full and detailed report by the Attorney General as to what he had done with the million dollars and what prosecutions, if any, had been instituted. The second resolution called attention to various reports which had been filed with the Attorney General's office by the Federal Trade Commission, in which it is alleged recommendations were made, or at least evidence submitted, which called for the prosecution of a number of corporations for violation of the Sherman antitrust law and of the Clayton Act.

I concede that there may be information in these reports—I have not had the opportunity as yet to examine them—that ought not to be made public, because there may be suits still pending, and to reveal to the public the full information might hamper the department in protecting the rights of the United States. I also concede, in harmony with the view of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, that the information in these reports may be of considerable advantage to the special committee which has just been appointed, and I have no objection to the reference of these reports to that committee; but I want to state now, Mr. President, that if the committee shall not use these reports or, if having examined them, they make no reference to them or do not report them back to the Senate for action by the Senate, I reserve the right, then, to call the attention of the Senate to the reports and, if deemed necessary, to ask for their return to the Senate, so that it may order such disposition as may be deemed proper under the circumstances.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. My question is particularly with reference to the documents and the report relating to the prosecution of war-fraud cases. The Senator will remember that when that report came in here I asked for and received from the Senate an order for its immediate publication as a document, because I thought the light ought to be let in and we should have fullest publicity, but the next morning, when the Senate convened, the Senator from Utah suggested that, in his opinion, and in conformity with the views of the Attorney General, there might be some matter that ought not to be published. I understand the Senator has since examined in some detail this document.

Mr. KING. No.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator has not done so?

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that his statement is substantially accurate. When the report first came to the Senate the Senator from Ohio moved that it be printed as a public document. I had not had sufficient time to read the report to learn that the Attorney General had suggested that perhaps some portions of the report ought not to be made public. I saw in the newspapers that evening that the Attorney General had made such a suggestion. I thereupon called the Presiding Officer over the telephone quite late at night, and then tried to get into contact with the Senator from Ohio, because I felt that that suggestion of the Attorney General ought to be respected to the extent at least of having a committee examine the report before it was ordered to be published. So the following morning I suggested that the order for printing be rescinded and that the report be referred to the Judiciary Committee to determine whether there was any part of it which ought not to be published. I have not read the report, let me say to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIS. I thought the Senator had, because I knew he had it in his possession and I thought he had read it.

Mr. KING. I had it for only a short time, and then returned it to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIS. It was my opinion then and it is now that the report ought to be published as a document, so that the information may be made available to the people.

Mr. KING. I am content for the present to have the committee which has just been appointed by the Senate consider the question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska allow me a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from Utah will look at the record I think he will see, as I did, that these documents were not referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee with instructions to winnow out such information as ought to be made public and such as ought to be kept secret. They were simply referred to the Judiciary Committee, and the committee did not know what use to make of them. Certain Senators wanted to see them, and, of course, any Senator was allowed to look at the reports, and I believe that several of them did so; but we were under no instructions about the matter. If we had been, I should not have reported back and recommended the reference to the other committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut and also by the Senator from Utah in regard to making public the reports of the Attorney General does not apply to the report of the Attorney General on the resolution which I introduced, the number of which I have forgotten. The reply to that resolution was read from the desk, and of course is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I only meant that, of course, to apply where the communication from the department suggested that it be not made public.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the chairman of the committee that the proper place for all of these reports is in the hands of the special committee. I think they ought to be referred there for such action as they in their judgment may deem proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection up to this time. The communications and reports will be referred to the special committee.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES AND INSULAR POSSESSIONS.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate Resolution 162, Order of Business No. 180, authorizing the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions during the Sixty-eighth Congress to hold hearings and employ a stenographer.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not do that. This is Calendar Monday, and the calendar can only be set aside by unanimous consent. Debate is limited to five minutes; and I do hope that the balance of the time until 2 o'clock will be put in on the calendar. I therefore ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Reports of committees are in order.

SENATOR THOMAS J. WALSH, OF MONTANA.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, out of order I send to the desk and ask to have read two letters showing the lengths to which some of the interests of this country are going in an endeavor to ascertain and find out something detrimental to the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the letters will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK COMMERCIAL,
New York, February 15, 1924.

Mr. E. C. SHIELDS,
Associated Industries, Billings, Mont.

MY DEAR MR. SHIELDS: How goes the game? I have not had time to write you since Heck was a pup, as the work down here has been exceptionally heavy.

Now I am writing only because I want a little "dope." I want the "low down" on one THOMAS WALSH, Senator from your State. To what extent has he been mixed with Bill Dunn and the radical element? What is his political life, so far as connections with radicals are concerned? If you have anything along that line, shoot it to me, please, and I will be your everlasting friend.

Hope the game goes well with you. When you have any bulletin or news matters about open-shop work in Billings, mail it in; we like to use all such matter in the Commercial.

Yours for national loyalty,

FRED R. MARVIN,
Editor Searchlight Department.

BILLINGS, MONT., February 19, 1924.

FRED R. MARVIN,

DEAR MR. MARVIN: In response to yours of February 15, will say that to be truthful no one can give you the desired dope and remain within the realm of truth.

As you know, Silver Bow County, which is Butte, is Democratic. Bill Dunn's crowd, in order to get anywhere, have to assume that they are Democrats. In such cases during the campaign they are forced on the Senator and other party leaders. This is the full extent of their relations. Remember Bill Dunn went to the legislature as a Democrat.

Senator WALSH is not and never has been a socialist. To appreciate the Senator it is necessary to know something of his life, his moral standard, and his lofty ideals.

The Senator started the practice of law in our State a poor man, but through his unusual ability and mining suits his fees made him wealthy. Strange to relate, as his wealth increased his concern for the less fortunate citizens, the masses, increased in proportion. It became his ambition to devote the use of his abilities to his fellow citizens rather than the further accumulation of wealth—an old-fashioned ambition.

The vested interests of the State prevented the legislature from gratifying this ambition. When the amendment to the Constitution was made effective he was the choice of the popular vote. His conduct since has never shown a desire to use his high office to retaliate for his defeat.

You have lived long enough in the West to know that we have produced some men of the first magnitude, who honor their fellow men for what they are, not what they possess. The possessor of wealth is not worshipped or honored because of its possession. WALSH is the personification of this idea. His early struggles with poverty seem to have not been forgotten. His sympathies, through this trait, are unusually keen, but never fear that they will lead him astray from the path of practical justice into the realms of some fancied utopia. His ability as an attorney, his keen sense of justice, prohibits his ever becoming a radical. His most bitter opponent will concede his honesty of purpose and laugh at the idea of any connection of his with radicalism. He is firm of convictions—never a wobbly. Had he been chairman or on the Senate investigating committee on radicalism, the cause would, through his conversion to it being a menace, have secured a most valuable adherent. His lofty ideas call for a republic in which its citizens are equal before the law and their constitutional guaranties are put into practice, not paper existence only.

It is difficult for me to convey the proper thought without your thinking I wish to eulogize him. It is a good deal like the liquor decisions of a Butte judge who is condemned as being biased by the drys when in reality he is a dry at heart, but he sees in their methods a danger of violation of personal guaranties given by our fundamental law.

None of the "isms" of Montana have touched WALSH. You can bet your hat he is like the granite of our hills.

We are still operating on the American plan to the satisfaction of all. Have not been issuing any bulletins, as we are conserving our expense account for the time. The Farmer-Labor Party was rejected by the State carpenters in their session in Butte the first week of the present month.

Wish you would step into your business office and have them credit our account with the amount of commission due us, which I take it to be $8. Will then remit the balance upon receipt of statement.

Get much pleasure in reading your sheet, aside from your department. Your editorial writer is a "whiz." Will keep in mind your request for information. With best wishes, I remain,

Yours truly,

E. C. SHIELDS.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary begin the call of the calendar where we left off the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The first bill on the calendar under the unanimous-consent agreement was the bill (S. 1181) naming the seat of government of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that had better go over.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I know nothing about the bill except that I have read it; that is all. What is the objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator would like to proceed with the consideration of the bill, I shall make no objection.

Mr. LODGE. I make no motion of that character. I thought perhaps the Senator would explain to me why he wanted the bill to go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

The bill (S. 1724) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act approved July 2, 1918, to abolish the inspection districts of Apalachicola, Fla., and Burlington, Vt., Steamboat Inspection Service, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1918, be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the words "Apalachicola, Fla.," and "and Burlington, Vt.," and by inserting the word "and" immediately before the words "Point Pleasant," so that the said paragraph as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4414. There shall be in each of the following collection districts, namely, the districts of Philadelphia, Pa.; San Francisco, Calif.; New London, Conn.; Baltimore, Md.; Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, Ill.; Bangor, Me.; New Haven, Conn.; Michigan, Mich.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Willamette, Oreg.; Puget Sound, Wash.; Savannah, Ga.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Oswego, N. Y.; Charleston, S. C.; Duluth, Minn.; Superior, Mich.; Galveston, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Providence, R. I.; and in each of the following ports: New York, N. Y.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Portland, Me.; Boston, Mass.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Toledo, Ohio; Norfolk, Va.; Evansville, Ind.; Dubuque, Iowa; Louisville, Ky.; Albany, N. Y.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo.; Port Huron, Mich.; New Orleans, La.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Juneau, Alaska; St. Michael, Alaska; and Point Pleasant, W. Va.; Honolulu, Hawaii; and San Juan, P. R., one inspector of hulls and one inspector of boilers."

SEC. 2. That the seventh paragraph of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1918, be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the words "and Apalachicola, Fla.," and "Burlington, Vt.," and by inserting the word "and" immediately before the word "Bangor," so that the said paragraph as amended shall read as follows:

"For the districts of Pittsburgh, Pa.; New Haven, Conn.; Savannah, Ga.; Charleston, S. C.; Galveston, Tex.; New London, Conn.; Superior, Mich.; and Bangor, Me.; and the ports of Dubuque, Iowa; Toledo, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; Memphis, Tenn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Point Pleasant, W. Va.; Jacksonville, Fla.; Tampa, Fla.; Louisville, Ky.; and Cincinnati, Ohio, at the rate of $2,100 per year for each local inspector."

SEC. 3. That this act shall be effective on and after the date of its approval.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the bill simply embodies two paragraphs of section 4414 of the Revised Statutes, with the words which the clerk has just read stricken out, and naming the different districts. I ask that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION SERVICE.

The bill (S. 1718) to amend section 4404 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act approved July 2, 1918, placing the supervising inspectors of the Steamboat Inspection Service under the classified civil service, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not insist upon that objection. The title of the bill, which has just been read, really discloses what the bill does. It simply puts these supervising inspectors of the Steamboat Inspection Service under the classified civil service.

Mr. McKELLAR. How many are there now, Mr. President?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are 11 authorized now. This cuts down the number to 10.

Mr. FLETCHER. It means a saving to the Government of $10,000 a year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It means a saving to the Government of $10,000 a year, and also takes these persons away from possible political appointment.

Mr. ROBINSON. How does it mean a saving of $10,000 a year? That does not appear on the face of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator from Florida is mistaken; it is not $10,000 a year, but $3,450. The Senator from Florida was referring to the bill we just passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that the same salary they now get?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is the same salary they now get. It does not increase the salary.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, it does not either increase or decrease the cost of the service?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It decreases the cost. It provides for 10 supervising inspectors instead of 11. As I understand, by a rearrangement of the districts there are now only 10 districts, but the law authorizes 11, and this bill limits it to 10.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no necessity for 11?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; there is no necessity for 11.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, I should think at least that part of the bill should be enacted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I said, the other proposition is to put these men under the civil service.

Mr. KING. Is it the only purpose of the bill to place them under the civil service?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the sole purpose of the bill.

Mr. KING. They have not been under the civil service in the past?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have not been.

Mr. KING. These have been political appointments?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Partisan appointments have not been made, but they are legally not on the classified civil-service roll.

Mr. ROBINSON. The greater number of them have served for a very long period?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true.

Mr. ROBINSON. Can the Senator state when the last appointment was made?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not; but men in the service have been promoted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are examinations held for these places? There must be some kind of an examination.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is not necessary that they should have an examination. A man can be taken from the outside and put in one of these places, as far as my knowledge goes now, but the department has been taking them from the service and promoting them.

Mr. McKELLAR. This change will provide that hereafter there must be examinations?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They will be required to have examinations.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire of the Senator whether those who have been promoting this legislation are the employees themselves, who, perhaps, for fear of being discharged, probably for incompetency or for some other reason, desire to be entrenched for life under the protecting arm of the civil service?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Secretary of the Department of Commerce has urged this legislation. A similar bill has been reported from the committee two or three different times, but we have not been able to get it through as yet.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit, of course, if these men are put under civil service that does not mean that they can not be removed for incompetence.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course not.

Mr. KING. I differ from the Senator from Nebraska if we are to judge from the few removals where there are so many complaints by superior officers of incompetency. This is not for the purpose of blanketing into the civil service a number of incompetent employees who might otherwise be discharged?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I say to the Senator that the local or assistant inspectors are now in the classified service? This applies to the supervising inspectors who are appointed now by the President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. My recollection is that this legislation was recommended by the preceding administration.

Mr. ROBINSON. The committee reported on the bill unanimously?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It did.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator indicate which district would be deprived of a supervising inspector?

Mr. LODGE. No district is to be deprived.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The letter of the Secretary does not state, but I inquired of the department and was informed by them that they have reorganized the districts, so that they need only 10 instead of 11.

Mr. LODGE. It is a consolidation of districts.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suppose so.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The reason for my inquiry is that for the last two or three years the office of supervising inspector in western Pennsylvania has been performed by an official who lives in St. Louis, and it has not seemed to us that that district was getting the attention it deserved. I was curious to know whether the Senator could tell us whether it is the intention of the latter part of the bill to make that arrangement permanent?

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question for information? How does the residence of the supervising inspector affect the character of his services as such?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The inspector located at St. Louis has to take charge of all the inspections in the St. Louis district, and under the present arrangement, which is not sanctioned by the law, as I understand it, he is also supposed to take care of the Pittsburgh district, which is a pretty big contract in itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course a small number of these supervising inspectors perform service for the entire country. It is expected that they shall travel a great deal. It is not expected that the performance of their duties shall be limited to the immediate vicinity of their residence.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I quite understand that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am really trying to ascertain whether there has been a failure efficiently to perform the service required of the inspector by reason of his residence in St. Louis.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am told so by the people in the steamboat business in Pittsburgh, and they have been urging the appointment of an inspector for that district, but none has been appointed. There has been a vacancy there for several years.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Apparently these complaints have not come to the department with such force as to make the department feel that an additional inspector is necessary, because prior to last year they have had 11, but the department itself recommends a reduction to 10, thinking they can take care of the situation with that number.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I had a complaint as recently as last week. Will not the Senator allow the bill to go over until that point can be determined?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if the Senator would like to have it go over——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to have it go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If we should pass the bill, it would go to the House, and the House committee could look into the situation; but if the Senator would like to have it go over, of course its consideration may be deferred.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will not take up that phase of the matter respecting his locality with the department, so that if it is satisfactorily explained, when we reach the bill on the calendar the next time, we can pass it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will be very glad to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

COLLECTION OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1786) to amend sections 5, 6, and 7 of the act of Congress making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, approved July 1, 1902, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. This bill appears to be quite a lengthy one and contains many rather important provisions relating to the District of Columbia. I do not see the Senator who reported the bill in the Chamber, and I think it ought to go over for the present, at least.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

PARKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—DONATION OF LAND BY CHARLES C. GLOVER.

The bill (S. 1971) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to accept certain land in the District of Columbia, dedicated by Charles C. Glover for park purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to accept the land lying along Foundry Branch between Massachusetts Avenue and Reservoir Street, dedicated by Charles C. Glover for park purposes, and containing approximately 77½ acres, as more accurately shown on map No. 1003, filed in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, which tract of land shall be known as "The Glover Parkway and Children's Playground"; and the said commissioners are further authorized to accept any dedications of additional land contiguous to this tract for park purposes.

SEC. 2. That the Glover Parkway and Children's Playground and additions thereto, when acquired, shall become a part of the park system of the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the measure just passed calls for more than a passing remark in commendation of the munificence of Mr. Charles C. Glover. The people of Washington and the Government are indebted to Mr. Glover for the important work which he has performed in behalf of the public park system of the District of Columbia. He has devoted much of his time for many years to the interests of the Capital of the Nation. With broad vision, he has perceived the needs of the Capital of this great Republic and has earnestly sought to have broad and comprehensive plans adopted that would comport with the dignity and importance of this beautiful city. Except for his persistent and unselfish efforts Washington would not now possess the fine parks which adorn the District of Columbia and add to the beauty of the Capital.

The bill just passed, as stated, is another evidence of his interest in Washington and his public spirit in behalf of a comprehensive park system. Mr. Glover is entitled to the gratitude of the residents of the District of Columbia, as well as the Government of the United States. I hope, in some fitting and proper manner, his generous contributions and his faithful service in behalf of the interests of the District may be recognized.

ADDITION TO COURTHOUSE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 1972) to provide for the erection of a fireproof addition to the courthouse of the District of Columbia in Judiciary Square for the use of the office of recorder of deeds, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Architect of the Capitol is hereby authorized and directed to construct a fireproof addition to the courthouse of the District of Columbia for the use of the office of the recorder of deeds and such other activities of the District of Columbia as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate, including fireproof vaults and heating and ventilating apparatus, in accordance with plans to be prepared under the direction of the said architect; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated a sum not to exceed $735,000 for the said addition, including preparation of plans and specifications, 60 per cent of which shall be chargeable to the revenues of the District of Columbia and 40 per cent to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VETERANS' BUREAU HOSPITAL AT CORPUS CHRISTI, TEX.

The bill (S. 2100) authorizing the sale of the United States Veterans' Bureau Hospital at Corpus Christi, Tex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of this bill. I do not see any written or printed report accompanying it. Why is it proposed to sell the hospital at Corpus Christi?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I introduced the bill at the request of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the building now in use as a hospital?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Oh, no; the building was only partially completed, and it was damaged considerably by a storm. The information which I have—that which was conveyed to the committee—is that the building has been held to be unsuitable for hospital purposes, and is not used as a hospital now. The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] prepared a report on the bill, but I have not a copy of the report here. The committee is reporting this bill for passage, because they are convinced that the building is unsuitable for use as a hospital, and that it would cost a very considerable sum of money to repair the damage caused by a very severe storm.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Has this bill been referred to the Veterans' Bureau for consideration and report?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. That I can not say. I introduced it at the request of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] reported the bill; but he is not present, and I have not a copy of his report.

Mr. ROBINSON. It occurs to me that a measure of this character, a bill providing for the sale of a hospital reservation by the Veterans' Bureau, ought to be considered by the head of that bureau, so that he can furnish the Senate with the facts as to whether the building or the reservation is needed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I inquire of the Secretary if there is a report by the subcommittee on this bill at the Secretary's desk?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is advised that no report was filed with the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator from Minnesota any idea what this property is worth?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have not the figures here now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

COLLECTION OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, when Senate bill 1786 was reached I was otherwise engaged and I had overlooked the fact that I reported that bill. I think the request is made that it go over because of the length of the bill. I would like to have the attention of the Senator who asked that it go over. I think I can explain it in just about two minutes. This bill provides for administrative changes to aid in the collection of taxes, and so forth, and it is urged by the District Commissioners.

The first section of the bill simply provides in a legislative way for those assessments. The law as it is now provides for a board of five, although in the appropriation bills for several years we have provided for six, so this section simply makes legislative provision for what we have been carrying legislatively in the appropriation bills.

Mr. ROBINSON. Have six been performing the service?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KING. Are six necessary?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; that is the point.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; clearly necessary, because we have provided for them in the appropriation acts for several years. This would indicate that they have made a pretty strong showing as to the necessity for that number.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; if we have appropriated for them, of course they would have that number.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not exactly in that way, but we do not appropriate for additional ones unless there is a pretty good showing made.

Section 2 simply defines who shall be residents of the District of Columbia for the purposes of taxation. That provision is necessary for administrative purposes. Section 3 gives authority to include certain property after the assessment books have been made up. With the rapid development of building Senators will readily appreciate the necessity for that provision. Section 4 is the reenactment of the old law providing that property shall be assessed at its actual value. I understand that is just a reenactment of the provision of the law as it stands now.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is that statute now in force?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it actually carried out?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know whether the assessor actually assesses property at its true value or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator what is the meaning of full and true value?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. My recollection is that there was a hearing three or four years ago at which it was stated that the assessment is made on the basis of about 85 per cent of the actual value.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am at a loss to understand the consistency of carrying on the books a statute that requires property to be assessed at its full and true value and then adopting a policy of taxation that assesses it upon a different basis. Why reenact this statute? Nearly all of the States of the Union, or at least a number of them, have provisions that all property shall be assessed at its fair market value, and then through some process they assess the property at a certain percentage of its value. It seems to me it is a bad policy to legislate in that way. Why not say that property shall be assessed at 85 per cent of its value instead of writing into the statute what might be termed a fraudulent provision?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I imagine if we did that they would assess the property at about 60 per cent. A legislative enactment would not force them to levy on the basis of 85 per cent any more than it does now on the basis of 100 per cent, but then if we should not put such a provision in the law would still exist in that way.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have in mind a thought that I have not made clear to the Senator from Washington. I do not know of a jurisdiction in the United States where property is assessed at its actual, full, and true value. I wonder if the Congress wants again to commit itself to a basis of assessment in the District of Columbia that does not actually prevail anywhere else in the country?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have objection to striking out that provision, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not ask that it be stricken out, but I think that it ought to be considered very seriously before it is reenacted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Would the Senator like to have the bill go over?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think it had better go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield for another question about fair and full value?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator tell us what is the difference in valuation as fixed by the Rent Commission and the value as fixed by the tax authorities?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I can not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been informed that the value as fixed in listing the properties to the Rent Commission is very much greater than it is when the same properties are rendered for tax purposes. It seems to me there ought to be some provision in the bill to ascertain similar values, both for fixing the value which forms the basis of fixing rentals to those who have to rent property, and for fixing a valuation for taxation purposes. It appears to me to be manifestly fair and just that instead of section 4 of the bill some system should be adopted to bring about uniformity as between the value of property fixed for rental and the value of the same property fixed for taxation purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is probably true. I will just read the last paragraph of the report, which shows clearly what the purpose of the bill is. It is not intended as a general revision of the law or to make fundamental changes. It reads:

The changes proposed in the bill make no radical departure from the provisions of the existing law, but are intended to improve the administration of tax and license matters.

If the Senator would prefer to have the bill go over, I have no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will not the Senator let it go over at least for to-day?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will remain on the calendar.

HAROLD KERNAN.

The bill (S. 1213) for the relief of Harold Kernan was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read by the reading clerk.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment in line 3 to strike out the words "accounting officers of the Treasury Department are" and insert in lieu thereof "Comptroller General of the United States is," so as to read:

That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Harold Kernan, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report as requested.

The reading clerk read the report submitted by Mr. CAPPER January 30, 1924, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1213) for the relief of Harold Kernan, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

Strike out the words "accounting officers of the Treasury Department are" and insert in lieu thereof "Comptroller General of the United States is."

Strike out the words "first lieutenant, Thirteenth Field Artillery," and insert in lieu thereof "captain, Twelfth Field Artillery."

The purpose of the bill is to credit the account of Harold Kernan, now serving as captain, Twelfth Field Artillery, United States Army, in the sum of $3,426, with which said officer was charged for money stolen from an enlisted man serving under him while stationed at the city of Brest, France, in October, 1919, and for which he was held responsible.

A similar bill (S. 405, 67th Cong.) was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims (S. Rept. 166) and passed the Senate December 7, 1921. House bill 11397, in which the same provision was contained, passed the House of Representatives January 27, 1923.

The following letter from the former Secretary of War, in which he recommends the passage of the bill, is appended hereto and made a part of this report:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 20, 1921.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated January 14, 1921, inclosing copy of H. R. 14814, a bill for the relief of Harold Kernan, and requesting that you be furnished with copies of the papers in this case and that I express an opinion as to its merits.

The Adjutant General has been directed to furnish copies of the desired papers, from which you will see that the loss of the funds was due to the robbery of an enlisted messenger who had been intrusted with their transfer from the sales branch, depot quartermaster's office, to the finance office in the city of Brest, France. The board which investigated this matter at the time of the loss held Captain Kernan responsible, due to his not having provided a sufficient guard. It appears, however, that since the transfer took place in the middle of the afternoon and the route followed was along frequented streets, the failure to provide more adequate protection was due to an error in judgment which might have been committed by anyone similarly placed. This view is also justified by the fact that Captain Kernan's predecessor had, so far as the papers disclose, followed the same procedure in the daily transfer of these funds. I feel, therefore, that the ends of justice will be served by granting the relief contemplated.

Respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of some member of the committee if the object of the bill is not primarily to relieve some insurance company or some bonding company of the obligation upon them to pay the amount or to refund to them the amount which perhaps they have paid into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that all I know about it is that Capt. Harold Kernan is a prominent citizen of my State, and that while he was serving in France to the very best of his ability he was in charge of certain duties in the city of Brest. Following the precedent set for him by his predecessors he committed this fund, some $3,400, to one of the soldiers, who carried it through the streets of that city along frequented routes about the middle of the afternoon. The messenger was set upon and robbed. Captain Kernan's account was charged with the amount, and, as I understand it, he has not been paid that amount of money.

I can not answer the Senator's question as to whether some insurance company may have refunded the amount lost by Captain Kernan, but my understanding is that he has just had that much of his salary charged up to him, and the Government now owes him the amount which was lost without any error or misdoing on his part. It is a case of very genuine hardship, I will say to the Senator, that this young soldier should have been charged up with that amount of money through no fault or neglect of his own. The Senate passed a similar bill once and the House passed it once.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that we have had a number of cases somewhat similar to this, and the Senator is familiar with the fact that we have had many such cases from post offices. Obviously the Government ought to require bonds, and doubtless it does now, of those who are charged with the responsibility of caring for Government funds. If bonds are given of course they would protect the Government against robbery and burglary as well as against losses from other quarters. It would seem to me that if a bond were given by Captain Kernan, the Government of the United States ought not to be called upon now to compensate the insurance company.

Mr. RANSDELL. I do not think any bond was given. This was in time of war, I remind the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt to say that if the captain himself was under bond, the surety company signing the bond, he would still be liable as principal. The only recourse to the surety company would be after the principal was called upon to pay and was unable to pay, so that in any case if he was under bond he would be liable for the loss if the loss were chargeable to him.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, may I answer the inquiry of the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to his colleague?

Mr. RANSDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The insurance company could not have been charged with the amount, because it has been charged to Captain Kernan's account. The Government is not out anything and the company is not responsible for the return of the money to anybody. The bill passed the Senate last year at a time when I was a member of the Committee on Claims, and we went into it quite fully. Army officers were not required at that time to furnish bonds. I understand that since then the law has been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In line 6, after the word "as," strike out the words "first lieutenant, Thirteenth Field Artillery," and insert in lieu thereof "captain, Twelfth Field Artillery," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to credit the account of Harold Kernan, now serving as captain, Twelfth Field Artillery, United States Army, in the sum of $3,426, with which said officer was charged for money stolen from an enlisted man serving under him, for which said officer was held responsible, while stationed at the city of Brest, France, in October, 1919.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD M. M'CARTY.

The bill (S. 225) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Edward M. McCarty was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over. Certain matters have been brought to my attention in connection with the bill, and I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico). The bill will be passed over.

SIAMESE SUBJECTS AT WEST POINT.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point two Siamese subjects, to be designated hereafter by the Government of Siam, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to permit two Siamese subjects, to be designated hereafter by the Government of Siam, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that the said Siamese subjects shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the academy, to be studious, and to give their utmost efforts to accomplish the courses in the various departments of instruction, and that the said Siamese subjects shall not be admitted to the academy until they shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that they shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or in conduct and so recommended by the academic board: And provided further, That in the case of the said Siamese subjects the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXPERIMENT IN RURAL MAIL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 2111) authorizing the Postmaster General to conduct an experiment in the Rural Mail Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection in made to the bill, and it will go over.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] will not object to the consideration of the bill. The Senator objected to its consideration the other day, when, of course, it had to go over. The passage of the bill is recommended by the Postmaster General. It does not require any appropriation. It is also unanimously recommended by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It simply proposes an experiment on certain rural mail routes, but does not affect other routes at all. I therefore hope the Senator from Utah will not object to its present consideration. Of course, the Senator has a perfect right to oppose the bill or to object to its consideration, but I have consulted with a large number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, and they all agree to the merits of the bill except the Senator from Utah. If the experiments made by the rural carriers on the 50 rural routes are successful, it will be a great help to farmers who wish to sell their products, and it will also benefit the consumers in the towns and cities.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that I shall have to adhere to my opposition to the bill. I shall be glad when we have more time to have the bill taken up and to discuss it, but there are some features of it to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and I could not do so under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been made, the bill will go over.

CLAIMS OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The bill (S. 2115) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Cherokee Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DIAL. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

INDIAN NATIONS OR TRIBES IN MONTANA, IDAHO, AND WASHINGTON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 321) for the relief of certain nations or tribes of Indians in Montana, Idaho, and Washington, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to consider and determine all legal and equitable claims against the United States of the Blackfeet, Blood, Piegan, and Gros Ventre Nations or Tribes of Indians, residing upon the Blackfeet and Fort Belknap Indian Reservations, in the State of Montana; and the Flathead, Kootenais, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Nations or Tribes of Indians, residing upon the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana; and the Nez Perce Nation or Tribe of Indians, residing upon the Lapwai Indian Reservation, in the State of Idaho; and upon the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, for lands or hunting rights claimed to be existing in all said nations or tribes of Indians by virtue of the treaty of October 17, 1855 (11 Stat. L. p. 657, and the following), and in said Flathead, Kootenais, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles Nations or Tribes of Indians by virtue of the treaty of July 16, 1855 (12 Stat. L. p. 975, and the following), with said Indians, and all claims arising directly therefrom, which lands and hunting rights are alleged to have been taken from the said Indians by the United States, and also any legal or equitable defenses, set-offs, or counterclaims, including gratuities, which the United States may have against the said nations or tribes, and to enter judgment thereon, all claims and defenses to be considered without regard to lapse of time; and the final judgment and satisfaction thereof shall be in full settlement of all said claims.

That suits under this act shall be begun by the filing of a petition within two years of the date of the approval of this act, to be verified by the attorney or attorneys selected by the claimant Indians, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, employed under contracts executed and approved in accordance with existing law. The claimant Indians shall be parties plaintiff and the United States shall be party defendant, and such suits shall on motion of either party be advanced on the docket of the Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court of the United States. The compensation to be paid the attorneys for the claimant Indians shall be determined by the Court of Claims in accordance with terms of the said approved contracts and shall be paid out of any sum or sums found and adjudged to be due said Indians. But in no event shall said compensation exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the respective judgments, nor exceed $25,000 for the Indians residing on each respective reservation: Provided, however, That said compensation shall not exceed $25,000 for the Nez Perce Nation or Tribe of Indians residing on both the Lapwai and Colville Indian Reservations, said compensation to be exclusive of all actual and necessary expenses in prosecuting said suits. The balance of any such judgments shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians entitled thereto and draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN H. M'ATEE.

The bill (S. 107) for the relief of John H. McAtee was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

MEDICINE BOW NATIONAL FOREST, WYO.

Mr. KENDRICK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 699) authorizing the addition of certain lands to the Medicine Bow National Forest, Wyo., and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why can we not go on with the calendar, Mr. President? I think we should go on with the calendar.

Mr. KENDRICK. I am anxious to have the bill for which I have asked consideration brought before the Senate, because I have to leave the Chamber in a little while. The bill will only take a moment. A similar bill has heretofore passed the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. There are other Senators who are interested in bills on the calendar who have been waiting here for days to secure their consideration. I dislike, therefore, for the Senate to take up some other measure out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To-day being Calendar Monday, it would require unanimous consent at this time to bring up the bill consideration of which is asked for by the Senator from Wyoming.

EXTENSION AND WIDENING OF CERTAIN STREETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 114) to vacate certain streets and alleys within the area known as the Walter Reed General Hospital, District of Columbia; and to authorize the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to its southern terminus south of Dahlia Street, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Blair Road, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to provide for the necessary extensions and additional buildings to be erected at the Walter Reed General Hospital, in the District of Columbia, all public streets, except Fourteenth Street, and alleys included within the area bounded by Sixteenth Street on the west, Alaska Avenue on the northwest, Fern Street on the north, Georgia Avenue on the east, and Aspen Street, as platted on the official survey map, on the south be, and the same hereby are, vacated, abandoned, and closed, the portions of public streets within said area which are hereby abandoned and closed by this act being known as Thirteenth Street, Fifteenth Street, Dahlia Street, Dogwood Street, and Elder Street.

SEC. 2. That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for the extension and widening of Fourteenth Street from Montague Street to the southern boundary of the Walter Reed General Hospital grounds, Nicholson Street from Thirteenth Street to Sixteenth Street, Colorado Avenue from Montague Street to Thirteenth Street, Concord Avenue from Sixteenth Street to its western terminus west of Eighth Street west, Thirteenth Street from Nicholson Street to Piney Branch Road, and Piney Branch Road from Thirteenth Street to Blair Road, all in accordance with the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That of the amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said extensions or widening, plus the cost and expenses of the proceedings hereunder, four-tenths shall be assessed against the property which the jury shall find to be benefited.

SEC. 3. That when Fourteenth Street shall be opened for traffic to the south boundary of the property known as the Walter Reed General Hospital grounds, numbered for purposes of assessment and taxation as parcel eighty-nine sub seven, the control and jurisdiction of that part of Fourteenth Street as laid down on the plan of the permanent system of highways of the District of Columbia which lies within the said hospital grounds, shall immediately pass to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the same in all respects as other streets and avenues in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the grade of the street through the hospital grounds shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 4. That an amount sufficient to pay the necessary costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto, and for the payment of the amounts awarded as damages, is hereby authorized, payable out of the revenues of the District of Columbia; the amounts collected as benefits to be covered in to the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] what approximately will be the amount which will be required to be appropriated out of the Treasury or charged to the District of Columbia in order to meet the judgments that may be rendered against the District in the execution of the plan proposed in this bill?

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I am unable to answer that question. The legislation proposed by the bill involves a matter which has been before the Committee on the District of Columbia for about four years. Until during the last Congress the different departments could not agree on a bill covering the matter. The War Department objected to the street being open through the hospital, but under certain conditions, as provided for in the pending measure, the War Department, the Surgeon General, the highway commission, and the District Commissioners all have agreed to the passage of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to a proviso in section 2 of the bill, which reads as follows:

> That of the amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said extensions or widening, plus the cost and expenses of the proceedings hereunder, four-tenths shall be assessed against the property which the jury shall find to be benefited.

That provision or one very similar is found very often in bills of this character.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I shall yield in just a moment. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the practice of inserting in bills such language as that which I have just read from the pending bill. It may be in this case that it will work all right; I know nothing about it; I have not talked with anybody who is interested in any of the property involved; but it seems to me hardly proper for us to say that the amount of damages, or any part of the amount of damages, shall be assessed as benefits, when we do not know and can not know whether anybody is going to derive any benefits or whether one man may not have a benefit that is worth more than four-tenths. If he has, it ought to be assessed against him. There may be some other property involved which will not be benefited at all, or benefited less than four-tenths. This is an arbitrary fixing of the amount that shall be assessed as benefits, and certainly it has no justice in it. It seems to me that it is wicked. Now I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska will recall that a day or two ago the very question which he now raises came up in reference to certain other special bills of this character, and no objection was made to those bills; but they were passed with the assurance by members of the committee that there were particular circumstances connected with them which made the proposed legislation equitable in those particular cases. I find upon examination that we now have a uniform condemnation law for the District of Columbia, and I can not understand why these proceedings can not be brought under that law.

Mr. NORRIS. I should think they could.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the only possible reason that can be advanced for the condemnation proceedings not being undertaken under the general law is that some special benefit may be derived by having special bills passed and condemnation proceedings under such special bills. I do not think bills of this character ought to be passed. I gave notice the other day that I should object to the next bill of this kind that was brought up. The Senate does not have the time or opportunity to go into the details of each particular case.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate took a week, it could not go into them as thoroughly as might be desirable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will go over.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to add a word.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not intend to take the Senator off his feet at all. I beg his pardon and I beg the pardon of the Chair. I withhold the objection for a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not know anything about this bill; I am speaking of the general practice. I have in mind now a case that was pointed out to me several years ago by a person who claimed that he owned a lot where a street was widened. It was the only lot he owned; he had been saving his money to buy that lot for a good many years; but the way in which the street was widened took a good share of the lot and made it almost worthless to him, leaving him only a little strip of land, and yet under the law he was assessed—and it was the duty of the officials to assess him—for benefits to that land when he received nothing but damages.

I can conceive how the opening of a street may add very materially to the value of property. If it does, the owner ought to pay for it; but I can see how it can bring him no benefit and perhaps a damage, and in that case the public ought to pay him for the damage; he ought to be paid from some source, anyway. To say in the law that four-tenths or one-half or any other fraction, or all, arbitrarily is going to be assessed up as benefits when we do not know what the benefits will be and do not know what the damages will be, is absolutely unjust, and such a provision ought never to be included in any statute.

Mr. McKELLAR. I renew my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

F. A. MARON.

The bill (S. 799) for the relief of F. A. Maron was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill may go over until I can have an opportunity of looking into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BROOKHART subsequently said: Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber a moment ago when Order of Business No. 117, being the bill (S. 799) for the relief of F. A. Maron, came up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill went over under objection.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the bill went over, very well.

PAUL B. BELDING.

The bill (S. 611) for the relief of Paul B. Belding was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,000," so as to make the bill read:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Paul B. Belding, of Hot Springs, Garland County, Ark., the sum of $5,000 for injuries received while serving as a member of the Reserve Officers' Training Camp at Fort Sheridan, Ill., on the 24th day of June, 1921, due to the explosion of a rifle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATH TO NATIONAL BANK DIRECTORS.

The bill (S. 2269) to amend section 5147 of the Revised Statutes was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5147 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5147. Each director, when appointed or elected, shall take an oath that he will, so far as the duty devolves on him, diligently and honestly administer the affairs of such association, and will not knowingly violate, or willingly permit to be violated, any of the provisions of this title, and that he is the owner in good faith, and in his own right, of the number of shares of stock required by this title, subscribed by him, or standing in his name on the books of the association, and that the same is not hypothecated, or in any way pledged, as security for any loan or debt. The oath shall be taken before a notary public, properly authorized and commissioned by the State in which he resides, or before any other officer having an official seal and authorized by the State to administer oaths, except that the oath shall not be taken before any such notary public or other officer who is an officer of the director's bank. The oath, subscribed by the director making it, and certified by the notary public or other officer before whom it is taken, shall be immediately transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency and shall be filed and preserved in his office for a period of 10 years."

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I think I can explain this bill in a sentence.

Section 5147 of the Revised Statutes requires that directors of national banks shall be sworn, but the law does not provide any officer who can administer the oath, and consequently the law is a dead letter. This bill merely provides that the directors of national banks shall be sworn by a notary public; in other words, a notary public shall administer the oath. It also requires that a record shall be kept in the office of the comptroller. That is all the bill provides. It passed the Senate in the last session but did not pass the House.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN B. WALKER.

The bill (S. 365) for the relief of Ellen B. Walker was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay $5,000 to Ellen B. Walker, of Albuquerque, N. Mex., as full compensation for the death of her husband, Thomas A. Walker, who, while in the employ of the United States Government, in the Bureau of Indian Affairs, lost his life by the collapse of a water-tower structure at Paguate, N. Mex., on July 17, 1915.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like some explanation of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The present occupant of the chair perhaps is the only Senator present who can explain it. Quite a lucid report has been filed with the bill. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and a similar bill passed the Senate during the last Congress. The employee lost his life in the construction of a water tank at Albuquerque, N. Mex., and the Interior Department has recommended the passage of the bill for the relief of his widow.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the able Senator from New Mexico and the able Presiding Officer whether the amount is chargeable to the funds of the Indians or whether it is chargeable to the Treasury of the United States?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is chargeable to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether under the usual procedure it ought not to be chargeable to the funds of the Indians?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those particular Indians have no funds, and so it would be of no avail.

Mr. KING. Was there any negligence upon the part of the decedent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Interior Department reports there was no such negligence.

Mr. KING. Does the able Senator from New Mexico, from his knowledge of the case, think the bill is a meritorious one?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I certainly do.

Mr. KING. Yielding to the judgment of the able Presiding Officer, I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMMA LA MEE.

The bill (S. 833) for the relief of Emma La Mee was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Emma La Mee, widow of the late Frank W. La Mee, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 as full compensation to her, the said Emma La Mee, for and on account of the death of the said Frank W. La Mee, caused by his falling in an open elevator shaft in the United States post-office building at Jacksonville, Fla., on December 3, 1919.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALASKA COMMERCIAL CO.

The bill (S. 1021) for the relief of the Alaska Commercial Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Alaska Commercial Co., a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the State of California, legal owner of wharf at Dutch Harbor, Alaska, and which wharf was damaged and partially destroyed on or about November 5, 1920, through collision with the U. S. S. Saturn, United States Navy, may be sued for by said Alaska Commercial Co. in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the said Alaska Commercial Co., or against the Alaska Commercial Co. in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 33) making eligible for retirement under certain conditions officers of the Army of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2154) to amend the act of September 22, 1922, entitled "An act to provide for the applicability of the pension laws to certain classes of persons in the military and naval services not entitled to the benefits of article 3 of the war risk insurance act as amended" was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 5) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil and Mexican Wars and to certain widows, former widows, minor children, and helpless children of said soldiers and sailors, and to widows of the War of 1812, and to certain Indian war veterans and widows, was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) authorizing the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City to invest its funds in the construction of a building for its branch office at Denver, Colo., was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) authorizing the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City to invest its funds in the construction of a building for its branch office at Omaha, Nebr., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

SAN CARLOS FEDERAL IRRIGATION PROJECT, ARIZONA.

The bill (S. 966) for the continuance of construction work on the San Carlos Federal irrigation project in Arizona, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the able junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] whether, under the five-minute rule, we can consider this case, with all of its details?

Mr. CAMERON. I think so. I should like to start it, anyhow; and then, if we can not finish it, I shall have no objection to its going over. I do not intend to make a speech on it. I want the statement of the committee read, and I believe then that everybody will understand it.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator be satisfied if he makes a statement and then gives us a chance to examine it before the next calendar day? It involves five or six million dollars, I understand.

Mr. CAMERON. Of course, I shall be glad to have that done if Senators prefer to have that course taken; but this is an important measure, and we have waited on it for a great many years. I should like to get it through, if I can, as soon as possible, so that the people in that valley will know what we are going to do. However, I am willing to acquiesce in the Senator's desire.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, did the Senator from Utah ask that the bill go over? If so, before that is done, will he permit my colleague and myself to make short statements within the five-minute rule?

Mr. KING. Certainly. What I asked was, in view of the importance of the bill, whether the Senator thought it should be considered under the five-minute rule. It seemed to me that we ought to have a little further time. I shall be glad to hear the Senator's statement, however.

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague, I know, wishes to make some observations, which is his right under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I shall be glad to hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I have here a committee report which I think will cover this bill in its entirety. I ask unanimous consent to have it read from the desk as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The principal legislative clerk proceeded to read the report (No. 129) submitted by Mr. CAMERON on February 8, 1924, and read as follows:

(Report to accompany S. 966.)

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 966) for the continuance of construction work on the San Carlos Federal irrigation project in Arizona, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,500,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, for the construction by the Indian Service of the San Carlos Reservoir project for storage purposes, as contemplated in report submitted by the chief engineer of the Indian irrigation service to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs under date of November 1, 1915, embodied in Appendix A, hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, act of June 30, 1919, provided the total cost of the project shall be distributed equally among the lands in Indian ownership and the lands in private ownership that can be served from the waters impounded in said reservoir: Provided, That the cost assessed against the Indian lands shall be reimbursable to the Treasury of the United States on a per acre basis, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; and there is hereby created a lien against all such lands, which lien shall be recited in any patent issued therefor prior to the reimbursement of the total amount chargeable against such land, and that the construction cost as fixed against the land in private ownership under the project shall be paid by the owners in not less than 20 annual installments, in accordance with such rules and regulations to be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That said project shall only be undertaken if the Secretary of the Interior shall be able to make or provide for what he shall deem to be satisfactory agreements with the private landowners for the repayment of their proportionate share of the cost of the project, and that the money hereby authorized to be appropriated shall be available for the acquiring of necessary rights of way by purchase or judicial proceedings and for other purposes necessary in successfully prosecuting the work to complete the project: Provided further, That for the beginning of this work subject to the provisions hereof there is hereby authorized to be appropriated $500,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended."

This bill, as amended, has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and the following letter from the Secretary of the Interior is made a part of this report:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 24, 1924.

Hon. J. W. HARRELD,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HARRELD: I am in receipt of your request for report upon S. 966, a bill to authorize the construction of what is known as the San Carlos irrigation project, Arizona.

It appears that this project has been studied by the chief engineer of the Indian irrigation service, whose report of November 1, 1915, was printed as an Appendix A, hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs, House of Representatives, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, "on the condition of various tribes of Indians."

A substitute bill has been prepared in the Office of Indian Affairs and is herewith inclosed for consideration by the committee.

Should Congress decide that the construction of this reservoir is desirable and that an appropriation therefor should be authorized, this department will be glad to carry out any construction work directed.

Sincerely yours,

HUBERT WORK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I call attention to pages 2 and 3 of the report of the committee, where appears a letter written by Mr. S. M. Brosius, who represents the Indian Rights Association.

Mr. Brosius has for many years been the agent and attorney of the Indian Rights Association, and I read the following from his letter. It is addressed to Hon. JOHN W. HARRELD, chairman of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and is dated February 8, 1924. Amongst other things, Mr. Brosius, referring to Pima Indians, says:

The millions of our people are awakening as never before to the obligation of a Christian Nation toward these wards of the Government. They are urging upon the Congress—yes, demanding—that justice shall mark our treatment of the red man.

We urge that you will be alert in the effort to redeem the Nation's obligation by vigorously supporting the San Carlos irrigation project.

Very respectfully,

S. M. BROSIUS,
Representing the Indian Rights Association.

Humanitarian persons all over the United States who have examined this legislation proposing to construct the San Carlos project are favorable to the project.

There are some physical features about the construction of this project that have in the past caused perplexity, but happily these features are solved. I have no doubt that the bill as reported has language eligible and appropriate to take care of the desilting of the reservoir, but out of abundant caution I offer the following amendment and ask that it be adopted when the bill is called up for consideration.

On page 4, after the word "expended," on line 4, I move to add the following:

And provided further, That $500,000 of the amount hereby authorized to be appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended in confining the Gila River within a fixed channel in Graham County.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Take it in my time, if the Senator's time has expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator why this matter was not brought up when we were considering the Interior Department bill, and were considering the reclamation projects, and were considering the Indian projects? It seems to me that if this bill ought to be passed, it should come here with the O. K. of the Reclamation Service and of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. ASHURST. The bill has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Bureau, but it does not carry an appropriation. It simply authorizes an appropriation. Therefore it could not be placed into the Interior Department appropriation bill. It is an authorization for future appropriations.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor, but I want my amendment adopted.

Mr. CAMERON. I will state, for the benefit of the Senator from Utah, that this comes under the Secretary of the Interior and the Indian Department. It does not come under the general reclamation law, but it is governed by practically the same law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I shall have to ask that this bill go over. It is a very important measure, and this is a very important amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator permit my amendment to be disposed of?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that is too important an amendment to be disposed of until we get the bill up for consideration. I have read over the report partly, and it appeals to me very strongly, and I probably shall have no objection to the bill; but it does seem to me that we ought to have more time to consider an important measure like this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table. The bill will be passed over, on objection.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDING AT DENVER.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I was called to the Chamber when Senate Joint Resolution 3, Order of Business 132, was reached; but the call did not come to me in time, and the joint resolution was passed over. I ask unanimous consent to revert to that measure, which provides for the erection of a branch bank of the Federal reserve system in the city of Denver, Colo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent to return to Order of Business 132, Senate Joint Resolution 3. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 3) authorizing the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City to invest its funds in the construction of a building for its branch office at Denver, Colo.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$650,000" and insert "$550,000," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City is hereby authorized to invest in the construction of a building for its branch office at Denver, Colo., on lots heretofore acquired for that purpose, a sum not to exceed $550,000 out of its paid-in capital stock and surplus.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado state the circumstances which make necessary the construction of this building?

Mr. PHIPPS. I shall be very glad to do so. The business of the Federal reserve bank at Denver runs up into hundreds of millions of dollars. At present they are carrying on their business in rented quarters, which are inadequate, which are overcrowded. They have no place in which to store their money. Part of it is kept in the mint building at Denver and other parts in as many as three and sometimes four different national banks in the city of Denver. They are required to handle very large sums of money. The site proposed for the building is within easy distance of the Union Station, where the funds come in and the bank building could be readily reached.

The building in design is comparable to one which has been erected in Oklahoma City and will be also practically the same as one proposed for Omaha, Nebr., where the business conditions are very similar. The property value at the present time of the land where the bank building would be erected I would estimate at about $175,000; and if any banking institution had that property and were going to improve it, they would spend not less than $1,000,000 for the structure alone.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bank is now occupying rented quarters, I take it?

Mr. PHIPPS. It is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator know what rentals are paid or required?

Mr. PHIPPS. I fear my recollection on that subject is not good enough to enable me to state it accurately, but this was gone into very thoroughly by the Federal Reserve Board. There was a hearing here at which the representatives of the parent bank in Kansas City were present, and I have discussed the matter somewhat with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] and, I believe, also the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], who are interested in the bill, which puts a limitation of $250,000 on such structures without the consent of Congress being obtained for a larger expenditure.

Mr. ROBINSON. What vault facilities are now available?

Mr. PHIPPS. The vault facilities now, as I have said, are practically nil, because, instead of having the money right in the same building where they are carrying on their banking business, they can have only part of it there. The great bulk of it has to be carried in the United States mint and at least three national-bank vaults, where they are borrowing room. As the Senator may recall, a little over a year ago we had a robbery right in front of the mint in Denver, when money belonging to the Federal reserve was stolen by bandits and two lives were lost, one of the bandits and one officer of the peace being killed. The matter has been gone into very carefully, and I believe the estimate of $550,000 is fair and moderate and will only provide a building suitable for the needs of the city and the business the bank is carrying on and one that will be in keeping with other institutions erected in that central part of the city.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether the committee has considered this general policy of constructing bank buildings in the various cities where the Federal reserve is doing business, and whether it is considered necessary and wise to invest such large sums as will certainly be called for in so many places in the United States for these buildings if we inaugurate the practice.

Mr. PHIPPS. Where they have branches I think the policy would be to have their own buildings, but not necessarily as extensive or expensive structures as they would erect, for instance, in Denver, in Omaha, or in Salt Lake City, where, as the Senator probably recalls, building construction is now under way, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDING AT OMAHA.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I request similar action with reference to Senate Joint Resolution 51, authorizing the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City to invest its funds in the construction of a building for its branch office at Omaha, Nebr.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "$650,000" and to insert "$550,000,'" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City is hereby authorized to invest in the construction of a building for its branch office at Omaha, Nebr., on lots acquired for that purpose, a sum not to exceed $550,000 out of its paid-in capital stock and surplus.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREAT KANAWHA RIVER BRIDGE, WEST VIRGINIA.

The bill (S. 1614) providing for the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River below the falls in West Virginia under certain conditions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorise the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River below the falls, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same," approved March 3, 1887, be, and the same is, hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to repeal an act authorizing the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River."

CUMBERLAND RIVER BRIDGE, TENNESSEE.

The bill (S. 431) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River in Montgomery County, Tenn., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress approved August 31, 1919, to be built by the county of Montgomery, State of Tennessee, across the Cumberland River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation and within a distance of 7 miles from Clarksville, in said county and State, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SECOND LIEUT. AMBROSE I. MORIARITY.

The bill (S. 2090) to provide for the advancement on the retired list of the Regular Army of Second Lieut. Ambrose I. Moriarity was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments; on page 1, line 4, to strike out the word "Congress" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Senate"; on line 5, to strike out "Moriarity" and insert in lieu thereof "Moriarty"; and after the word "Army," on line 7, to insert the words "with retired pay from the date of said appointment, as now prescribed by law for a major of his length of service retired prior to July 1, 1922," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and hereby is, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Ambrose I. Moriarty, second lieutenant, on the retired list of the Regular Army, a major on the retired list of the Regular Army, with retired pay from the date of said appointment, as now prescribed by law for a major of his length of service retired prior to July 1, 1922.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will go over, under the rule.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: Mr. President, I would like to have the Moriarty bill taken up and considered. I have no special interest in it except that the man is lying ill, with attendants taking care of him, and has not sufficient funds to support him. He was a gallant soldier, and has been greatly afflicted. The bill had due consideration in the committee, and I believe had the unanimous support of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. KING. I woud like to inquire a little further into the matter. Was this man a Regular Army officer?

Mr. WARREN. He was.

Mr. KING. Could he not be retired under the present law?

Mr. WARREN. Under the circumstances, I think he receives but small pay. He was retired as a second lieutenant, I believe. The history of the case is in the report; I do not recall all the facts now.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over, and I will consider it before we reach the bill at the next call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over.

CAPT. RAMON B. HARRISON.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 46) for the relief of Capt. Raymon B. Harrison was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

ANNIE M. PETERSON.

The resolution (S. Res. 121) was read and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to Annie M. Peterson, sole surviving child of John Hickman, late a skilled laborer for 58 years in the employ of the Senators' barber shop, a sum equal to one year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death; said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

COL. GEORGE M. APPLE.

The bill (S. 1763) to validate certain payments made to George M. Apple and to authorize the General Accounting Office to allow credit to certain disbursing officers for payments of salaries made on properly certified and approved vouchers was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That payments of salaries or compensation made to George M. Apple as an employee of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the United States Veterans' Bureau, and the United States Veterans' Bureau regional office in Denver, Colo., in the period from November 20, 1920, to August 17, 1922, on properly certified and approved vouchers, be, and the same are hereby, validated, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes," approved July 31, 1894, and that the General Accounting Office be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to allow credit in the settlement of the accounts of disbursing officers making such payments to the extent that credit for the payments has not already been given: Provided, That any amount heretofore collected from said George M. Apple on account of payments so validated shall be refunded to him from appropriation or appropriations credited with the refundments.

Mr. KING. I would like to have an explanation of the bill from the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, this bill is identical with the bill which was considered by the Senate and passed at the last session.

Colonel Apple, while on the retired list, accepted employment from the Veterans' Bureau after having raised the question as to compensation. He was advised that it was entirely proper for him to accept this employment, notwithstanding the fact that he was on the retired list of the Army.

The matter went on for some six or eight months, during which time he was receiving his pay from the Veterans' Bureau and drawing his retirement pay. Then there was a ruling on the part of the Comptroller General to the effect that he was not properly entitled to receive pay from the Veterans' Bureau. Then they stopped his pay in the Veterans' Bureau and began to reimburse the Treasury out of his retirement pay, leaving him with practically nothing. That has been his condition. He has been even without his retirement pay, and, as I said, the Senate considered this bill at length at the last session and passed it, but it did not reach the House Calendar in time for consideration.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. PHIPPS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think this really will become a precedent, which may be pointed to in future legislation?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not. The circumstances are quite peculiar in that one feature. Colonel Apple went to the trouble to write to headquarters at Washington and get a ruling on the part of some officer in the War Department, and was informed in reply that it was not in violation of law for him to accept this employment. He rendered the service which some one else would have rendered and would have been paid for had he not rendered it. He drew the pay for the time he served. Then the adverse ruling came from the Comptroller General, he lost his employment, and his retirement pay has been stopped until the Government shall be reimbursed for the pay he had drawn from the Veterans' Bureau. I think it would not establish a precedent. There was a ruling to the effect that he was qualified and had the right to accept that service.

Mr. KING. I would like to inquire of the senior Senator from Wyoming, who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and familiar with legislation, whether it has been considered wise for retired officers to accept employment at the hands of the Government and draw two compensations, and whether there have not been rulings against the wisdom of that course?

Mr. WARREN. As I recall the rulings affecting retired officers, they have had the right to accept positions and receive salaries from employers outside of the Army. There were cases where they could take employment under the Government, and it was ruled that such employment was all right if the compensation did not exceed a certain sum. I do not recall any ruling as to the amount which should be paid in a case like this, and I do not know what this man's salary was. It is a question as to whether there has been some difference in the way the ruling has been construed in the department. Of course, the Comptroller General may have established some rule differing from the rule enforced at an earlier date.

Mr. KING. There is no doubt in my mind but that he ought to receive in the aggregate the highest amount; that is, if the retired pay was higher than the compensation allowed by the Veterans' Bureau, he ought to receive that amount; or if the Veterans' Bureau compensation was in excess of the retired pay, he ought to receive that amount. But I question the wisdom of adopting a policy which permits men who are upon the retired list, and who are drawing a considerable compensation from the Government, to accept employment and get the full compensation which might be paid for that particular employment.

Mr. PHIPPS. As a matter of principle, I would certainly agree with the Senator. I think in this case, where the man was entirely innocent of any wrongdoing, and tried to be so straight that he went to the trouble of sending to Washington to have a direct ruling on this matter of special employment, a different rule should apply. It is not a matter of taking regular employment. This was special work he was doing for the Veterans' Bureau, and having the authority to go ahead and accept the employment, and having performed the service and having received the compensation, it seems rather hard that he should be called upon to surrender the amount of money he was paid for that special service. I think he was in the clear. There was no suspicion of wrongdoing on his part.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator whether this case comes within the provision in the appropriation act of last year prohibiting officers, after being retired, from engaging in work which involved contracts with the Government, and that sort of thing?

Mr. PHIPPS. I will say to the Senator that it undoubtedly would; but this occurred before the passage of the act which the Senator has in mind. I would not like to say as to the specific nature of the work, because I understand it was an unusual duty he was performing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 2250.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war, and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

COST AS A FACTOR IN PRICE FIXING.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, there is no more important question confronting the farmers to-day than that of price stabilization so as to insure a reasonable return and some profit to the farmer. This is necessary before any industry can be secure against failure. The farmer as a class is in other respects no different than any other group or industry—the woolen goods manufacturer, the steel industry, the petroleum-products industry. To succeed each must be assured a reasonable return on their investment and for their labor. The farmers are the only group who are not already assured such a protection. Some are assured by the tariff, as the woolen industry or trust. Some by direct subsidy; for example, the silver-mine operators; likewise the proposed ship subsidy. Others by indirect subsidy, as the railroads; others by patent control, frequently combined with a monopoly, as the Steel Trust or monopoly, the Standard Oil monopoly, and so forth, the Banking Trust, the Insurance Trust, the Packer Trust, and so forth.

The farmers of the great West and Southland, as I shall attempt to show, are afforded protection under neither of these provisions, and are, therefore, placed at the mercy of the middleman and speculator, often controlled by some gigantic groups or some organizations already mentioned.

Unless by some means we afford protection to the farmers of the great West and South, the region where are produced our great surplus of foodstuffs, not only to meet the wants of the great industrial centers of the East but for fully 80 per cent of the surplus for foreign export, we shall face food shortage if not real famine.

I desire, therefore, at this time to present some observations on this vital question, and especially with regard to cost as a factor in price fixing by farmers.

PRICE FIXING.

Mr. President, those financial and business interests which oppose the proposal to make cost of production a chief factor in the fixing of farm prices show more temper than reason. They represent that such action would amount to a conspiracy in restraint of trade, but ignore the fact that all of the great producing corporations base their selling prices on costs, except where market conditions enable them to sell at prices so high that costs may be ignored. They hold that the proposition is economically unsound, but they advance no economic principle to sustain this assertion, except the broad general proposition that price is due to the relation between supply and demand. This generalization is employed without qualification or explanation, notwithstanding the fact that economists have long since stated very important qualifications, without which the law of supply and demand does not apply at all.

Mr. President, the price of any commodity at any given time is determined by the relation of the effective supply to the effective demand at that time. The effective supply is the quantity of a given commodity actually on the market at a given price at a given time; and the effective demand represents the volume of actual offers to buy at that time and at that price. The actual supply or the actual need for the existing supply of a given commodity may be greater or less than is represented in the offerings to buy or to sell; but the fact of the supply being greater or less or the need greater or less at any given time is only one factor among a great many making the effective supply or the effective demand.

The fixing of a price under which the producer or producers of a given commodity will not sell it may itself be an important factor in effective supply. And likewise the fixing of a price above which purchasers will not go may be an equally important factor in determining effective demand. To illustrate: If all of the facilities for the production of steel were in the control of a single corporation the effective supply of steel products would be the quantity that such corporation would furnish at a given price. Similarly, if all the consumers of steel products were represented by a single buying concern the demand would be the quantity that buying concern would take at a stated price. With both the producers' interest and consumers' interest thus consolidated, it is, of course, conceivable that there might be an absolute deadlock, so that trading in steel products would not take place at all.

LAW OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND NOT OPERATIVE.

Mr. President, under present conditions effective demand to the farmer is largely determined by buying interests which do not represent consumers at all, while effective supply to the consumer is equally controlled by selling interests that do not come into contact with the farmer, nor in many instances even with the buyers who determine the effective demand to the farmer. Largely on account of the seasonal nature of the marketing problem, and because of the peculiar business system that has arisen out of that fact, effective supply at the time when the consumer makes his purchase is quite a different thing from the actual quantity of products produced and sold by the farmers.

The objection to making cost the chief factor in the fixing of farm prices is entirely lacking in consistency, not only from the economic but from the ordinary business point of view. In any business cost must be the final factor in determining price for the obvious reason that continuing to sell below cost would bankrupt the business. Admitting that business must in the long run conform to economic law, it must also be admitted that it is as necessary for farming to be conducted on economic principles as for any other business or industry. The fixing of the price of any commodity by the producer has the effect of determining the basis for all transactions with regard to that commodity from the producer to the consumer. If, for example, the price of 1920 wheat had been fixed by united action of all producers at $3 a bushel, the effect would have been exactly the same as though the relation of the actual supply of wheat to the whole demand had determined that price. Of course, the fixing of the price at $3 may or may not have been wise. If in so fixing the price producers overestimated the demand or underestimated the volume of the crop to be sold, with the result that only half of the crop could be disposed of at $3 a bushel, they would undoubtedly have faired worse than as though they had sold for a lower price. That, of course, would be bad business, just as it would be bad business for the United States Steel Corporation or any other strongly organized industry to demand higher prices than the traffic will bear.

Such an error in business judgment would be corrected exactly in the same manner that errors in the judgment of individuals are corrected, where farmers sell their products without the aid of organization as they now do. In the long run, the result to consumers would be the same, owing to the gradual adjustment to market conditions of the prices asked by the producers. However, the period of adjustment would be shorter with united selling than with individual selling, because the united producers, having better and more complete information, would be less likely to go wrong in the first place, and would also be in a much better position to make readjustments upon the discovery of mistakes. With regard to the effect upon individual producers, united selling would be incomparably superior, since it would protect such high cost producers as are necessary to make up the needed supply, and would tend greatly to minimize the losses incurred in the progressive elimination of producers whose costs are too high to enable them to continue in operation at the prices warranted by the entire demand.

BANKRUPTING THE FARMER.

On the other hand, if prices were adjusted without regard to cost, taking into consideration only the possibility of selling at a given time, and under particular conditions, it is conceivable that all farmers might go bankrupt. It is entirely probable that under such a method of selling the losses incurred by the majority of farmers would accumulate so rapidly that within a few years they would be eliminated from production. It will not be denied that such elimination is constantly in progress under our existing system of marketing, and that it is likely to prove in the near future very disastrous to agricultural industry. The effect upon consumers of farm products is, in the long run, equally injurious, from the fact that the elimination of such high cost producers, in so far as they are necessary to make up the needed supply, will necessitate the substitution of inexperienced men who, because of their inexperience, will produce at still higher costs. These higher costs will finally be covered by higher prices to consumers, either under a condition of free competition or under the present condition of control of the markets by business interests. Assuming that no interest will take a loss unless compelled to, it follows that the stronger interest will eventually shift the loss to one or the other of the weaker interests, or will distribute it among them. In actual practice in farm marketing the losses due to selling below cost are first fastened upon the farmers, and then, as the entire industry is reduced to a lower level of efficiency by the taking of such losses, this condition is made the basis for the advancing of prices to consumers; so that the final adjustment of prices to consumers is made on the basis of the cost of the last considerable unit of the product necessary to meet the entire demand.

FARMERS PROFITS GO WHERE?

That, of course, leaves a profit for some one, represented by the difference between the highest cost unit and all other units. Under free competition, if that were possible, and with full information in the possession of all producers, each grower of wheat who is able to produce at a cost less than that of the highest unit would take a proportionate profit. For example, if, in any year, it required 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat to meet the entire demand, and the Northwestern section of the country produced 200,000,000 bushels, at a cost of $3 a bushel, the price for the entire 1,000,000,000 would be $3 a bushel. The farmers of the Northwest section would make no profit. But if, for example, the farmers of the Southwest, making allowance for the difference in grades and lessened cost of production for winter wheat produced at a cost of $2 a bushel, they would take a profit of $1 on every bushel produced.

Mr. President, the problem does not work out exactly this way in practice; first, because free competition does not exist; and, second, because of the advantageous position of the dealer in farm products with regard to the control of the market, through better sources of information, and a readier access to credit and other business accommodations. Because of this favorable position, the dealer is able to absorb a considerable portion, and possibly the greater part, of the profit that under conditions of free competition and equal access to information and other business service would go to the better situated or more skillful and industrious farmers.

It is obvious that these advantages to dealers will be greater as farmers are less united and less well informed, and less as the farmers develop greater unity, secure better information regarding market conditions and develop more orderly marketing methods, thus enabling them to exert an influence upon the market more nearly proportionate to their importance as producers.

NORMAL VERSUS MANIPULATED MARKETING.

The situation is here discussed without reference to alleged manipulation of the market or speculative activities injurious to the farmers which are well known to exist. Though there is ample evidence of the existence of manipulative and speculative activities, they may be ignored in this discussion, for the reason that, because of elements inherent in the situation, so long as they are without unity and without economic and business education, the farmers will be at a tremendous disadvantage, even though all interests concerned in the handling of their products are scrupulously honest and unitedly intent upon giving the farmers a square deal. However good their intentions, business interests can not adjust the entire agricultural situation on a sound economic basis for the protection of all interests involved, because they lack, in the first place, information concerning the fundamental factors of production and, in the second place, control of the ultimate factors of the situation. The business of the dealer in farm products is based upon the assumption of a continuous inflow of products at one end and an equally continuous demand for those products at the other. The business problem of the dealer is to adjust himself to the volume of such products in such a way as to make the highest possible profit upon his operations. In case of exceptionally heavy production, it is a recognized function of the dealer's business to slow up the movement to the consumer so as not to depress prices to the point where business profits would be endangered. This slowing up and feeding out process is not, and can not be, conducted primarily in the interests of either producer or consumer, but must, from the very nature of the situation, be conducted in the interest of the middleman. All the benefits that go to either the producer or the consumer are merely incidental to the conduct of the business of handling products in the interest of business profits.

MARKETING THEORIES.

Mr. President, it has been shown that if the prices of farm products to the consumer were based entirely on the relation between supply and demand, in a condition under which products moved with absolute freedom from individual producers to individual consumers, and in which there was absolutely accurate information equally shared by all producers and all consumers, the best that the consumer could hope for would be a price equal to the cost of the highest cost unit necessary to make up the needed supply.

But, as it must be admitted that such absolutely free competition and complete and equally distributed information do not and can not exist, what we have really to consider is a condition under which all economic processes from the field to the consumer's table are regulated, in one way or another.

Even in the absence of intentional regulation there is always a general state of mind, or psychology, of different economic groups and interests which goes a long way toward determining the relations between those groups. The cost of producing a bushel of wheat, for example, which is actually effective as an economic factor may not be the actual cost as it might be determined by an expert but what is held or believed to be the cost in a given section at a given time. If the farmers of Kansas have it fixed in their minds that it costs them $2 a bushel to grow wheat, no matter how that belief was acquired, it is bound to be a very important factor in the determination of price. If all producers of wheat should be simultaneously convinced that it cost them $2 a bushel to grow a particular crop, very strong reasons would have to be presented to them why they should sell at a lower price before they would yield. If, at the same time, all these growers of wheat had the idea firmly fixed in their minds that there was not enough wheat to go around, it would be still more difficult to get them to accept lower prices. And if they were all confident of their ability to hold out longer than the buyers, it would be practically impossible to beat down their price. The point is that the immediate determining factor of supply, as well as of demand, is often largely psychological. It is a matter of belief. It is the mental attitude of one economic interest pitted against the mental attitude of another. Facts may change the attitude of either or both, but facts other than this all-important fact of the mental attitude itself can have no effect upon the relation between supply and demand except in so far as they modify that attitude.

In the past the farmers have, of all interests, been the least able to get full information of market conditions. At the same time, because of their inability to act together, they have developed a common psychology with regard to the situation in a much lesser degree than have the business interests concerned with the marketing of farm products. Not until quite recently have farmers been at all definitely concerned with questions of cost. It was not so long ago that farmers were seeking a market only for a comparatively small surplus over what was needed to supply their own families, this surplus being counted upon to bring in money enough to pay taxes and to buy a few simple luxuries. The growing of great commercial crops is comparatively a modern development. And the economic sense of the farmer has developed only in proportion to the development of commercial agriculture. In fact, farmers have gone so long without considering costs that all other interests connected with the selling of farm products have counted upon that as a normal condition. This is true to such an extent that our entire industrial system has been built largely upon the assumption of a continuous flow of farm products in excess of normal demands and at prices correspondingly low. The present insistency of business interests that farmers are not justified in basing prices upon production costs is therefore largely an expression of the actual necessity to business for such a condition.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LADD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator if there has been any attempt in establishing the cost of producing wheat to work out a formula such, for instance, as the Warren formula for milk?

Mr. LADD. There have been during the past six or seven years various studies made in nearly all the great wheat-growing States, showing the actual cost of production on a number of farms that fairly represent conditions throughout the State.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, there has been a scientific effort made to work out the cost and the farmers now better understand what the actual cost is.

Mr. LADD. They understand better now what the actual cost is.

PRICE FIXING IN PRACTICE.

Mr. President, the most serious objection to the plan for unified selling of farm products by the farmers themselves is based on the difficulty, or, as many hold, the impossibility of determining farm costs. This objection, however, is not nearly so serious as it appears to be at first glance. In all other industry and business it is accepted as a purely common-sense proposition that prices shall be based on production costs. This does not mean that it is necessary in every case to determine exactly what is the cost of any article. Even in an industry concerned with the production of a single commodity it can not be expected that costs will be identical for each separate unit produced, nor that they will remain constant for every day or every month of the year. The final figure used as a basis for fixing selling prices will in every case be an average. This is still more true of an industry or business producing or handling numerous commodities, and of the business of great producing corporations having numerous divisions and plants, such as the United States Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil corporations, the big packing companies, and so forth.

Of course, cost figures not only as an element in the selling price of commodities produced in these industries, but, in the case of an individual or a corporation proposing to engage in a certain line of production, or in the furnishing of any certain service, it must be the chief factor in determining whether the enterprise will be undertaken at all. If the determination is against engaging in such industry or business, it will have the effect of limiting production in that line, and, therefore, a corresponding effect upon the selling prices of all goods produced in such industry, since it will limit the supply of such goods.

If in any industry there is so little organization and such an absence of reliable information with regard to existing or possible supply or markets that no cost figures can be compiled nor can it be determined whether commodities can be sold for prices that will cover costs. Everything is haphazard. Under such conditions not even a fairly good guess can be made by any individual producer as to whether or not he can pay costs of production. Such uncertainty has been largely eliminated in the production of metals and in the wholesale manufacture and distribution of food products and clothing. It is still more completely eliminated in the oil business. Even sugar, cotton, and wool producers are in much better shape for the determination of production costs than are the producers of the principal food crops other than sugar. And in every case the better situation is due to united action of one kind or another, usually in the form of voluntary association or of incorporation of large units, with more or less definite working understandings among them. The chief reason why farmers are relatively unable to determine costs is to be found in the fact that they are less well organized than those engaged in other industries.

DETERMINING THE COST BASIS.

The fact that under present conditions farmers would have difficulty in determining a cost basis for the fixing of prices does not mean that such inability would continue in equal degree after they had perfected their organizations. On the contrary there are the best of reasons for believing that in proportion as the farmers' organizations are perfected they will be able to develop an information service that will result in the early establishment of standards of production costs equal to those now in use in other industry and business. Much of the information necessary for the fixing of such standards already exists, having been accumulated during recent years by the United States Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the various State experiment stations, agricultural colleges, and extension departments. It is true that the results of this service have been subjected to very severe criticism; but in most instances such criticism may be heavily discounted, because of the fact that it is instigated by interests that believe they would be injured by the establishment of a cooperative system of marketing and the fixing of farm prices on a cost basis.

Mr. President, farmers do not expect to be able to fix the selling price of any farm product on the basis of the highest cost incurred by a particular farmer without regard to the natural productivity of his land or his own industry or ability. Nor have they any thought of attempting to fix prices without reference to the demand for their products. On the contrary, the probable demand would be in every case the first fact to be given consideration. With that determined the next question would be: At what cost can a sufficient supply of the given product be produced to meet this demand? If, say, it should be found that the probable domestic and foreign demand for American wheat in any year was 1,000,000,000 bushels, and if it were estimated that 100,000,000 bushels would have to be produced under such conditions that it would cost $2 a bushel, then the selling prices determined upon would be $2 a bushel. As already explained, that would leave profits to those producing at lower costs equal to the difference between their cost and $2 a bushel. Of course, with a unit selling organization perfected and in successful operation it might be possible to pool the entire crop and distribute profits on some other basis than that of costs in particular instances. That, however, is not a necessary element of the plan. And while in a fundamental sense the pooling of profits might be more just to all concerned it is obvious that the assurance of a price that would cover his cost to the less favorably situated farmer would be a great improvement over his present condition in which he nearly always takes a loss.

ADVANTAGES OF PROPOSED PLAN.

Mr. President, not the least among the advantages of such a plan is that the elimination of the grower who is unable to produce at the price fixed would be a comparatively painless operation. Under present conditions the only possible way in which a plentiful supply of farm products can be assured is to play up generally, and especially during the months just preceding the time of planting, the extreme desirability of planting the largest possible acreage. It is at this season that the middlemen and speculators resort to propaganda to induce the planting of a large acreage, and for whose benefit? Owing to the numerous uncertainties that are always involved in production it is never possible to assure a sufficient supply unless many plant crops under conditions that made it certain that they will lose, if a plentiful supply be produced. The only situation in which the so-called "marginal" farmer ever gets by is one in which either an extraordinary demand has been created or in which extraordinary losses are suffered by farmers who ordinarily have good crops. On the other hand, the best situated farmers never make big profits, except when the marginal farmers are eliminated from the market by the loss of practically their entire crop. Thus ample production means in every case hardship or disaster for a considerable number of producers. And in every case extraordinary success to any class of farmers comes only through the distress of bankruptcy of a great many others.

BIGGER THE CROP LESS THE PROFITS.

Mr. President, these facts are always soft-pedaled by those who yearly play upon the perennial hopefulness of farmers at planting time, through their propagandists whose interests are never identical with that of the farmers. Unhappily, these facts are often overlooked by the farmers themselves. Many farmers seem to accept at full value the general, vague proposition that the bigger the crops produced the greater will be their profits. It is obvious that quite the reverse is true. A large total production always means heavy losses to many and relatively low profits even to the most successful. The best years for the farmers who have the best land, the highest ability, and the greatest industry are the years of limited production and high prices. But high prices mean nothing to a farmer who has lost his crop; and, on the other hand, they often impose a ruinous burden upon the consumer. The present method of producing with no regard to cost, and with no beforehand adjustment of production to probable demand, is not beneficial to consumers. It has already been shown that where the law of supply and demand works at all, either under conditions of free competition or conditions of partial or complete monopoly, the consumer pays for the entire supply on the basis of the highest cost of any considerable part of it. The highest cost of the production of farm products under present practice is to be found on the so-called marginal land. This marginal land is used, partly because much of the better land is held out of use, or at prohibitive rentals, but largely because of the constant urge to production already explained. To illustrate: Studies made at the North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station showed that in 1919 a part of the wheat produced cost $14 a bushel. Of course, a farmer who can not produce for less than this will soon be eliminated in any case, but where the margin of difference is less there is always some ground for the hope that conditions will be better next year, or that certain improvements in methods may still further narrow the margin, so that the producer's balance will be on the right side. In any case those who are not able to establish such a favorable balance must soon be eliminated, with the result that the cost of their experiment is added to the entire cost of production for the given crop. This is all finally added to the price the consumer has to pay, and the difference between this highest cost and the cost in all other cases is taken somewhere as profit, as previously explained.

KNOWLEDGE OF COUNTRY'S NEEDS.

Under the proposed plan, with even an approximate fixing of a cost standard, individual farmers would be discouraged from undertaking production under these extremely adverse conditions. The result would be, in the long run, the limitation of the production of a given crop to the land best fitted for that purpose. It would lead necessarily to a better classification of agricultural land and a better system of cropping. It would lead to the improvement of methods of cultivation and to the adoption by farmers of better business practices, because of the fact that they would have a standard for their guidance. As compared with the present situation, there would be, if not in every case, at least for the principal farm crops, fairly definite beforehand information as to the prices that could be expected. Every farmer would have some reliable data on which to determine whether he should increase or decrease his acreage of this or that crop. Overproduction in any year could be definitely disposed of to take care of a part of the needs for the following year and planting adjusted accordingly. In short, we should have, in the place of the present haphazard system which gives no advantage to the consumer and which bankrupts thousands of farmers every year, to say nothing of the rapid exhaustion of soil fertility, a definite business system of agriculture adjusted to proved economic laws.

This is the entire proposition. Interests that oppose it must do so, either because of ignorance, or because they think that, through its establishment, they would lose the important advantages which they now hold, or think they hold. If their motive is that of self-interest, it is entirely likely that they are proceeding upon a mistaken assumption—which is that a sufficient supply of raw materials can be assured only by aiming to produce more than can be consumed. In the larger sense, this is to assume that existing organized industry and business depend for their success upon a continuous waste of human energy and natural resources. But this waste is exactly the thing that, if continued, will eventually ruin the industry and business that now supposes it is drawing advantages therefrom.

Mr. President, a readjustment of agriculture on the basis of the elimination of this waste is absolutely imperative for all business and industry. It is a condition upon which the life of the Nation depends.

The wheat farmers and particularly the spring wheat growers were during the war, and for two years or more thereafter, placed at a peculiarly disadvantageous position to which the people of no other group of farmers or of any industry were placed. The Government arbitrarily fixed the price of wheat so far below the cost of production as it turned out, and then demanded that the farmers be patriotic and produce wheat in increased quantity, and the wheat farmers responded to their Government's demand, but the Government failed to prevent or even to hold in check every other interest who in turn profiteered off the wheat farmer, and then in 1920, on what proved to be the most extensive crop produced in recent years by the spring wheat farmer and before he had an opportunity to market his 1920 crop, proceeded to remove the fixed guaranteed minimum price which was made the maximum price, and wheat at once proceeded to fall, largely because of a forced deflation policy brought on in the fall of 1920 by another governmental agency, the Federal reserve bank, and the spring wheat farmer found himself a bankrupt, made so by the policy of the very Government which he, the farmer, had struggled so bravely and unselfishly to help "win the war," supposing, as they had been told, they were fighting to "end all war." These wheat farmers, therefore, have a right to complain, and to insist that they shall not now be neglected and forgotten in their time of distress, for let me say, in my humble opinion, if the Northwest farmer is further forced into bankruptcy, the banks will continue to fall, the collapse will rapidly spread east, until from Montana and the Dakotas to the Atlantic seaboard we shall see such a crash as has never been known in the history of our country.

Lest you gain the impression that the farmers of my State grow only wheat, I want to call your attention to some of their achievements in trying to help themselves in spite of the great odds against which they have struggled. The following data is furnished by the department of agriculture and labor for the State of North Dakota:

[2] Estimated for year 1923 by assessors.

NOTE.—An average for 1923 of 37.6 cents per pound for butterfat was realized. The above does not include dairy products used on the farms.

While the showing is somewhat discouraging, the progress has been continuous, but the struggle has been a difficult one, and the great body of farmers can not meet the financial outlay necessary to enable them to recover from the low point to which they have been forced by their Government, State and National, even though other less essential industries have had Government aid and fostering care.

I can not believe this discrimination is intentional, but rather comes from the lack of knowledge and the appreciation of the real conditions that exist among the farmers as a class.

Mr. President, I have already several times referred to the fact that the law of supply and demand, especially in the marketing of certain agricultural products, was nonoperative in our great market centers and that organized buyers, under conditions now tolerated if not permitted by law, do largely influence prices received by the producers and determine the cost of the same articles to the consumers. Under our present, for the farmers, unfavorable marketing system, there is a wide spread between the price received by the producer and that paid by the consumer. In fact, it has been pretty satisfactorily determined by reliable agricultural economists that, for, at least, certain agricultural products, out of the consumer's dollar not less than 70 cents is used in getting the product from the hands of the producer into the hands of the consumer, thus leaving only 30 cents for the producer as his share of the consumer's dollar expended for such food.

In countries where truly cooperative marketing is most fully organized and developed I find, in studies made by myself, that a large share of the expense between the producer and the consumer had been eliminated. In fact, with an article like butter the cost of transportation and marketing had been reduced to as low as 20 cents in place of over 70 cents under so-called American competitive methods. This condition has been made possible by organization and control of the product from the time it is produced by the farmer until it reaches the retailer or, in some instances, the consumer himself.

Many years ago England was forced to decide whether she should continue as an agricultural country or as an industrial and commercial nation. She chose to become an industrial and commercial nation, thereby neglecting her agriculture, and sought to feed her people by importation of food products from foreign nations.

Denmark, more than 60 years ago, was called to make a like decision. The farmers being in majority fought for the rights of agriculture, and for 30 years they struggled cooperatively to reestablish agriculture on a profitable basis, but not until they had taken over the Government into the hands of the agrarian groups themselves which enacted laws favorable to the promotion of agriculture did they succeed, and to-day little Denmark, an agricultural country, is one of the most prosperous in Europe.

America may be both a great agricultural country and a great industrial and commercial Nation, but she can not be both, and, at the same time, as England did, strive in all her legislative activities to promote industry and commerce at the expense of agriculture. Both must be treated fairly. Each is entitled to a "square deal" and no more. In my humble opinion, this "square deal" can only come when the farmers are as fully and closely organized as are the other groups of industries of the country, and when they have their full share of responsibility in the conduct of the affairs of the Government, and I am confident industry and commerce will receive fairer treatment at the hands of the agrarians than have the farmers in the past at the hands of industry and commerce.

PUBLIC OPINION AND THE FARMER.

Mr. President, the daily press of the past few years have indicated that the chief trouble with agriculture is that the farmers do not know their business and that the fault is not with any but themselves. In other words, they want the public to believe that farmers are an incompetent lot of persons who have made a failure because of shiftlessness and lack of proper economies, but do any of those who say the farmers are incompetent, behind the times, wish to take up farming themselves? Most of the criticisms against the farmers' failure are usually by those who know little or nothing about farm life.

Let me say that, in so far as skill is concerned, I know of no great industry which requires for successful operation more practical and skilled men than for agriculture. I believe that the farmers of my State are mentally and physically the equal of those in any other business. In fact, to properly conduct an average North Dakota farm requires a bigger type of business man than is required to successfully conduct the average bank of the same section. Business men and bankers are beginning to realize this as they have been called upon to take over the bankrupt farmers' land and try to operate it and meet expenses and pay interest and taxes.

In commenting on those numerous exhortations to farmers "to be good and produce, produce; economize; don't buy so many automobiles, and spend less in moving pictures," one can but recall with due apologies the following lines:

> The quantity of lying is most strange;
> It droppeth, as the copious rains from heaven
> Upon the world around; it is twice cursed;
> It curseth him that lies, and him that hears.

Again, the farmer of the Northwest recalls that after he had been induced to plant in 1920 a big crop of spring wheat at great expense, before the crop could be harvested and marketed, the guaranty was withdrawn by the Government and the price of wheat was at once hammered down by the speculators who took advantage of the world conditions and gave the farmers of America an enormous loss. There was forced upon this country as a part of the greed and conspiracy of privilege against the mass of producers the drastic deflation policy secretly arranged by the financiers and bankers meeting here in Washington in the summer of 1920, whereby billions were lost to the American farmers, while enormous wealth was piled up by some of our great banking institutions as the result of the Federal reserve banking system put in operation through the secret influence of a small group of financiers who never seem to have heard of Goldsmith's words:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
> A breath can make them as a breath has made;
> But a bold peasantry, a country's pride,
> When once destroyed, can never be supplied.

Or, possibly, as many would have us believe, their greed to control the finances of the world made their souls callous to consequences, which, if continued, will most certainly furnish a harvest which will in the end destroy them and their most treasured possessions.

The farmer, Mr. President, is patient, patriotic, and earnest in his undertakings, but he will long remember his treatment and experience during and since the war, for:

> Through the years of doubt and sorrow,
> Onward went the farmer band;
> Now they sing of broken pledges,
> Bankrupt in a fertile land.

To permit such a condition, brought on through governmental agencies, to continue is to destroy our one great basic industry. Those who have labored among the pioneers of our country can not but feel disheartened as they see the conditions now prevailing in many sections of this country, and especially in the spring-wheat section. When we meditate on the faithful service of the farmers whom—

> Oft have we seen him in the peep of dawn,
> Brushing with hasty steps the dew away,
> To meet the sun upon the upland lawn—

while we long and pray that the wheels of time may fly swiftly around and bring the welcome day when the fetters which now bind the farmer to economic slavery will be broken forever.

WHEN THE FARMER GOES, WHAT THEN?

When the farmers have been crushed, which seems to be the ultimate result of the present program of the wicked and heartless profiteers and money changers, they will recall Omar Khayyam's lines:

> Indeed, the idols I have loved so long
> Have done my credit in men's eyes much wrong;
> Have drowned my honor in a shallow cup
> And sold my reputation for a song.

Mr. President, so long as such crimes, for crimes they are, continue any real man can not fail to cry out:

> As long as there is motion in my body,
> And life to give me words, I'll cry for justice.

An English writer, commenting on the deplorable condition of agriculture in Great Britain, said:

> I am absolutely certain that the only real and lasting measure that could bring about the return of millions of acres to cultivation is a small subsidy per acre on wheat and oats or a bonus per bushel.

Again, the same English writer says on wheat growing during and since the war:

> I quite fail to see the huge profits made by the farmer since 1914 which have emanated only from the fertile imaginations of those who are in complete ignorance of the whole matter.

There are many of our best farmers who feel the same way. That it is not more credit that is needed but credit at a more reasonable rate, such as was furnished to the railroads when they faced their crisis, or as was proposed to help a merchant marine. It is a price for what they produce which will save the farmers, for selling continually below cost of production will bankrupt any business.

The farmers look to Congress for relief in their crisis, for they know it was Congress which is responsible for the farmers' present plight and that of those who have had faith in the farmers and endeavored to aid them until they, too, are on the verge of bankruptcy.

Mr. President, the farmers of the Northwest have known for a long time that they have not received a square deal in the marketing of their grain, and now they have the proof in the report of the Federal Trade Commission regarding the activities of the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce toward the farmers' cooperative marketing undertakings.

HOW FEDERAL TAXES HAVE GROWN.

Farm taxes have been a heavy burden which has helped to crush our farmers. As our country has developed the Federal taxes have increased, and, recently, at a rapid pace. We can never expect again that they will go back to where they were before the war. The per capita Federal expenditure has grown, as follows:

United States per capita expenditure of the National Government.

	Federal expenditure tax.
1850	$1.77
1860	2.01
1890	4.75
1900	6.39
1910	7.30
1919	144.77
1920	60.80
1921	51.60
1922	34.80
1923	33.40

The maximum was reached in the fiscal year of 1919, namely, $144.77, or for each family of five persons it averaged $723.85. This was a heavy burden, and is now reduced to $33.40 per capita for the fiscal year 1923 and will probably be somewhat lower for the coming year. Now, add to this your State, county, municipal, and school taxes and the interest on your indebtedness and you can readily see the reason for their bad financial condition and why the farmer has been, as it were, up against a stone wall. Now that there is hope for better conditions there are those who would add further to the producer's burden while they lessen those of the more fortunate group who have become the recipients of great wealth.

What the farmer needs and wants is not charity but a "square deal" to enable him to exist and prosper; that is, conditions which will insure him a fair price for what he produces so as to enable him to secure the cost of production and a small but reasonable profit.

The farmers of North Dakota under Government stimulus during the war period increased her wheat production about 89 per cent, and a study of more than 100 farms, scattered throughout the State and fairly representative, for the past three years revealed the following facts as to the farmer's income per farm:

	Per cent.
Losses per farm, 1921, $848	2.8
Profits per farm, 1922, $525	1.9
Losses per farm, 1923, $109	.4

Or an average loss of $432 per farm for each of the past three years.

Certainly if these farms have lost so heavily under the condition that has prevailed in the State, other farmers will probably not average less of loss per farm for the entire State. On these same farms the average cost of living was determined per farm to be $804 annually, of which 61 per cent was produced on the farm and 39 per cent purchased. For the items produced on the farm the costs were distributed as follows:

Item.	Amount.	Per cent.
Vegetables	$79	16
Beef	37	8
Dairy products	227	46
Pork, ham, etc	67	13
Eggs and poultry	85	17
Total	485	100

FORECLOSURES ON REAL ESTATE IN NORTH DAKOTA.

As indicating the bad condition of the farmers of the spring-wheat belt, I present the records of sheriffs' foreclosure sales on real estate by counties in North Dakota for 11 months from January 1 to November 30, 1923. This record does not show the additional large number of cases where settlements were made without actual foreclosure proceedings being recorded.

I may say that I do not believe that the conditions in my State are materially different from those of other sections of the spring-wheat regions of Montana, North and South Dakota, or northwestern Minnesota:

BAD FAITH LEAVES LONG MEMORIES.

Mr. President, I dislike to say it, but since I have been in Congress there has not been many, if any, acts of legislation for the betterment of agriculture as they finally became a law that has measured up to the expectation of the farmers of the spring wheat section of the country; that is, it did not meet the needs of the farmers, as had been expected by those who originally sponsored the measure, sometimes because as finally enacted it was not practical, or it had a string tied to it, or it was enacted to benefit others under the guise of helping the farmer, or has been so hedged about by bureaucratic red tape as to be absurd. As, for example, in the loan features for intermediate credit, when rules were made—for my section, at least—they provided that no tenant farmer would be permitted to borrow, and other provisions equally unjust and impractical; or, under the Federal land bank, that if one member had failed to meet his obligations others of the community were barred from borrowing; or take, for example, the grain grading act, that because of grades unjust to the wheat grower which were established by the Department of Agriculture, and has cost the farmers of my State alone millions of dollars and given it into the hands of wheat speculators and the millers, who have prospered while the farmers have been made bankrupt.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the Senator a question, if it would not interrupt him.

Mr. LADD. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. FESS. My question is in reference to the bill. I notice that the bill is especially adapted to the spring wheat section and is designed to relieve the situation there. I notice that an amendment has been put in the bill, the first part of which limits the relief to the wheat section, and then the second part provides "for carrying on the purposes of this act in respect to other areas." What does that mean?

Mr. LADD. As amended it was intended to furnish the same kind of aid to the farmers in any other section of the country who might be under a like condition of depression.

Mr. FESS. Any other wheat section?

Mr. LADD. No; any other section of the country, with any other crop production.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator know of sections suffering in the way in which the wheat section is suffering?

Mr. LADD. The southern section of the United States is suffering from the ravages of the boll weevil, and various other sections in different parts of the country were mentioned, where they had suffered from drought, as in New Mexico, and other parts of the country as well.

Mr. FESS. I wanted the opinion of the Senator, as this entirely changes the purpose of the bill as originally introduced.

Mr. LADD. As originally designed, yes. As the bill was originally designed it was intended to put the wheat farmer on a parity with the other farmers of the country, but this amendment was offered for the purpose of enabling other sections of the country to be benefited by the bill.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator will permit, I would like to state that this last year I made a more or less intensive study of the wheat section of the country, and while I am not in favor of this sort of legislation as a general principle, I was convinced that something must be done, and it seems to me that this was legitimate; but I am not aware that other sections of the country are suffering as the particular section to which the Senator refers is, and that the remedy should be applied as we are asked to apply it to this.

Mr. LADD. I think it is very true that no other section of the country, because of governmental interference, we might say, was forced into the condition in which we find the wheat belt, and particularly the spring wheat belt, which was the section to be caught with price removal before the farmers were able to sell their crop.

Mr. FESS. That situation is the thing which impressed me with the fact that the Government had something to do with the overstimulus of wheat, and the result of that overstimulus is very severe.

Mr. LADD. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I thought that the purpose was to have diversified crops up there, through this particular legislation. Where are we going to diversify crops elsewhere?

Mr. LADD. That I am not familiar with. I think others are going to speak on that phase of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I assume that when the Senator speaks of Government interference he alludes to the price of wheat as determined by the Government fixing the price of wheat. Does the Senator recall the price that was fixed at the time?

Mr. LADD. The price that was fixed, or assumed as a minimum price, was $2.20, at which time wheat was selling for $2.75 a bushel in the markets every day. But instead of being a minimum price as it was administered it came to be a guaranteed maximum price, and in the last year it was raised from $2.20 to $2.26 as a maximum price.

Mr. FLETCHER. About what is the price to-day?

Mr. LADD. It is less than $1 in my State for the average wheat.

Is it any wonder the voters who do not benefit by the present system should vigorously protest in their votes against the candidates whom they hold responsible for failure to, at least, offer a vigorous protest before the country? I predict that if the administrative and party policies of the past six years are continued, in place of having, as now, not less than 13 States with one or both feet off the political reservations, we shall have at least 20 States so recorded. This need not be if we would face the situation and help to solve the problem for the farmers as we have helped to solve it for certain other industries. We shall be forced to face the situation, whether we will or no, or be prepared to meet many new faces in this body as well as elsewhere in Washington. I do not pose as a prophet, but facts can not be ignored, and such a forced detrimental policy continued when State after State in one great section of our country have vigorously protested in no unmistakable terms and other States are ready to do likewise.

This chosen course, in my humble judgment, is nothing less than deliberate political suicide, because—rather than to face a bad situation, made so in no small degree by Congress and the administration, and which only Congress and party leaders can take the lead to remedy the evil—many politicians evidently think the farmers, like themselves, soon forget; but when the votes are counted in November they, too, will not unlikely be found in the "lame-duck" group without regard to political party or protestations, for small farmers of the Northwest have each lost from $1,000 to $10,000 trying to be patriotic; have lost their life's earnings, their homes, and can no longer either properly clothe their children or give them an education. These farmers, producers of wheat, were told that "bread would win the war"; that "bread bullets" were just as essential as lead bullets for the establishment of world democracy. These farmers are not in a trifling mood, nor will they forget in the heat of another political campaign how they came to their present plight, even though the great statesmen are—

Far from the maddening crowd's ignoble strife.

If we would avoid the just wrath of the angry masses of producers it might be well to recall the words of—I believe it was—the "Pied Piper," who said:

When the devil was sick, the devil a saint would be.

For when the grain grower remembers the profiteering grain speculators and their splendid income he recalls the next line and feels that it fits his complacent exploiters, organized and protected, and repeats:

The devil was well, but devil a saint was he—and will take it out on those whom he holds responsible for his unfortunate plight.

Back of all this, Mr. President, the real trouble may be briefly indicated by quoting from an interview I furnished the press when I returned from abroad last summer, where I said:

We must not judge too harshly the disruption and political changes in Europe. They are but the culmination of the growth of an international disease that has reached its more advanced stages in the Old World, while here in America we are beginning to feel the sickening effects of that same disease, namely, the control and manipulation of credit for private gain.

Mr. President, I have received scores of petitions, letters, and telegrams indorsing the Norbeck-Burtness bill and urging its enactment into law. Before the Senate Agricultural Committee began hearings on this measure I sent the following telegram to all the North Dakota daily papers and to many others:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 5, 1924.

Editor THE HERALD,
Grand Forks, N. Dak.:

Senate Agricultural Committee will, during the coming week, hear witnesses on the Norbeck bill, Coulter plan, the Gooding stabilization bill, the Sinclair-Norris bill, and other bills. All parties interested will be heard.

I have here a few of the telegrams presenting only the essential parts, and ask that without reading they may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

From the Kiwanis Club, of Fargo:

"The Kiwanis Club, of Fargo, heartily indorses the Norbeck-Burtness bill appropriating $50,000,000 to be loaned to the farmers of the Northwest under the so-called Coulter plan and recommends that you urge its passage. We also recommend that the loans be made through governmental agencies direct to the farmers and not through private channels."

Another from the bankers of Jamestown:

"The Jamestown Clearing House, consisting of all banks in Jamestown, is very strongly in favor of the Coulter bill and urge our Representatives to favor the passage of the same, believing this measure will materially relieve the present situation."

From the Jamestown Chamber of Commerce:

"Jamestown, N. Dak., Chamber of Commerce approves and urges passage of Senate bill No. 1597, livestock loan bill."

From the Kiwanis Club, at Devils Lake:

"We to-day unanimously voted support House bill 4159, Senate bill 1597, Coulter livestock loan plan, as practicable and workable. Urgently needed assistance to our farmers. Prompt, favorable action by the Congress exceedingly important to entire Northwest."

From the Bottineau Commercial Club:

"We urge your support in securing the passage of Senate bill 1597."

From the Kiwanis Club, Casselton:

"The Kiwanis Club, of Casselton, urges you to support Senate bill 1597."

From citizens of Fordville:

"Farmers and business men in special meeting held yesterday urge your support of livestock loan bill, believing this bill offers cheap and permanent relief to agriculture."

From the Wahpeton Rotary Club:

"Wahpeton Rotary Club by unanimous vote went on record to-day favoring Coulter bill for aid of northwestern farmers. Believe this bill will greatly help bring back prosperity to our State and we urge you to use all honorable means to assist in its passage."

Mr. LADD. I quote, Mr. President, from a few of the many scores of letters that have been received indorsing the bill, and indicating the attitude of the citizens of North Dakota on the measure as indicating not only the attitude of many farmers but of groups of business men:

From Elmlawn stock farm, Hazleton:

"I am much interested in the $50,000,000 livestock loan bill which has been introduced. I believe it is very necessary that something substantial be done at this time. I believe that if this bill becomes a law it will be instrumental in keeping many worthy families on their farms, who would be otherwise forced to give their farms up. I am personally acquainted with many in my district that are unable to secure the necessary funds to enable them to diversify as they would like to."

From the Saunders Drug Co., Minot, N. Dak.:

"Our attention has been called to the livestock loan that is now pending in Congress, and realizing the vital importance of this issue, we deemed it advisable to write you and endeavor to show you that to bring about the passage of this loan is the thought that is uppermost in the minds of the people in the Northwest to-day.

"Kindly give to this issue your undivided attention, if possible, and bring about that which will earn the backing of the entire Northwest district.

"This is an opportunity not to be passed up, and what has been a dream in the past now may become a reality. The advantages of this loan we need not state, but these advantages will aid every individual."

From the Merchants State Bank, Richardton, N. Dak.:

"We are much interested in Senate bill No. 1597, introduced by Mr. NORBECK, of South Dakota, providing for loans to be made to farmers wishing to change their methods and diversify.

"It should not be hard to convince legislators that if our farmers are to diversify, they must have some financial assistance to enable them to make this change. Banks in communities where this help is most needed are as a rule least able to take care of it, they being the sufferers with the people in this unfortunate situation. In other places some people have lost faith in the banks and do not deposit or withdraw deposits, thus limiting the loanable funds such bank might otherwise have. Banks being unable to give the needed assistance, there seems to be no other source left, excepting our own Government. Agriculture being the basic industry, it should not take much argument to convince everybody that it would be to the advantage of all to give such aid to enable this industry to get along and develop."

From the Towner County Bank, Perth, N. Dak.:

"At a gathering of farmers and business men here this afternoon, it was the consensus of opinion that the Coulter bill for the aid of the wheat farmer was a good thing, and that every effort possible should be made to pass the measure in Congress. Will you not use your best influence toward this end?"

From the Commercial Club, Fargo:

"We want you to know that the members of this organization are vitally interested in the success of this measure, believing that it will be of great assistance to the people of our State in making further headway along diversification lines, and we want to urge upon you to use your best offices to get this bill approved by Congress."

From the Farmers' Equity Exchange, Scranton:

"The Farmers' Equity Exchange, of Scranton, N. Dak., with a membership of 130, indorses unanimously the Coulter $50,000,000 livestock loan bill, being House bill 4159 and Senate bill 1597, now pending before Congress. This bill will advance diversified farming in the Northwest by from 5 to 10 years and offers permanent relief. We trust you will use your best efforts to the end that this bill may be passed."

From the La Moure Community Club, La Moure:

"At the regular monthly meeting of the La Moure Community Club, at which a full membership was present, a resolution was unanimously adopted favoring the Norbeck-Burtness agricultural relief measure as being by far the most practical measure yet proposed for restoration of agriculture here in the Northwest. We believe it will prove to be the solution of our farming troubles and, if wisely administered, will prove profitable to the Government as well as a dominant aid to real, practical farming."

From the First National Bank, Buffalo:

"We write you this letter to urge you to do everything you can for the proposed $50,000,000 livestock loan. We have canvassed our farmers here, and a good 50 per cent of them are anxious to take advantage of this loan and go into the livestock business on a larger scale."

From the Thompson Stock Farm, Page:

"I hope you will do whatever you can to get this bill through for the benefit of the State and the farmers in general. I feel that stock raising is what this State must come to, and the sooner they start the better. Hogs and dairy cattle at least."

From Oakes Commercial Club:

"At a recent meeting of the Oakes Commercial Club, held for the purpose of discussing the $50,000,000 livestock loan bill, I was instructed to write to you and inform you that passage of the bill is urged by the business men of Oakes, it being the opinion of such business men that passage of the bill will greatly benefit the farmers in this community, as well as to stimulate business in general. Farmers in this section of the country desire to change from wheat farming to cows, hogs, poultry, and a diversity of crops, but are greatly handicapped by lack of ability to finance the change. Some governmental assistance is surely due the farmers of the Northwest, and it is believed the Coulter plan will meet their immediate needs more satisfactorily than any method previously under consideration."

From Northern Pacific Associated Shop Crafts' Booster Club, Jamestown (160 members):

"Resolved, That the employees of the Northern Pacific Railway Co., as represented by the Associated Shop Crafts' Booster Club, of Jamestown, N. Dak., are fully in accord with the provisions of the bill now before Congress, known as the Coulter bill (H. R. 4159 and S. 1597), providing for the relief of the Northwest farmers in the shape of financial assistance through a Federal loan, believing that present conditions throughout the Northwest fully warrant and justify the passage of such remedial legislation."

From the First National Bank, Petersburg:

"We have studied the North Dakota situation a great deal during the last few years. We are fully convinced that the salvation of our State depends greatly upon the introduction of diversified farming. Of all the plans which have been put forward for governmental assistance, the only one that at all appeals to us is the Coulter plan, and we are inclined to believe that this plan is the only one that stands any chance of getting through, and after all we believe the best way for our people is to start in helping themselves along diversified-farming lines."

From Bottineau County Bank:

"It is our understanding that the $50,000,000 livestock loan bill is now pending in Congress. We, together with the majority of the people in this community, are in favor of the passage of this measure and respectfully urge your careful consideration."

From Langdon Commercial Club, Langdon:

"We, the Commercial Club of Langdon, do heartily indorse House bill 4159 and Senate bill 1597, and urge you, our Congressman, to give this bill your whole support."

From Bank of Scranton:

"The Coulter $50,000,000 livestock loan bill is now before Congress for consideration. The sentiment of this community, including farmers and business men, is 100 per cent in favor of the passage of this bill, as it will advance diversified farming in the Northwest for from 5 to 10 years, and it appears to offer permanent relief for farmers not now able to finance themselves in diversification. We trust that you will use your best efforts to the end that this bill may be passed."

From Community Club, Borduine:

"Be it resolved, That owing to the present difficulties of the farmer in the Northwest, we favor the so-called $50,000,000 loan bill as introduced by Senator NORBECK, of South Dakota, and Representative BURTNESS, of North Dakota, and ask you to help in making this a law, so that our farmers can work out of their present difficulties."

From N. W. Hawkinson, Rock Lake:

"Isn't it about time that some real farm legislation was passed at Washington? It seems to me the two bills that ought to be put over are the so-called Coulter bill and the McNary-Haugen bill, or the Norris-Sinclair bill amended. The Coulter bill is a fine bill for those that save and need to take advantage of it, but it can not turn the great Northwest into a dairy farm overnight. It will be slow but sure in its work. In the meantime a bill like the McNary-Haugen bill should be immediately passed, so that the farmers will have some assurance that the 1924 farming operations will at least not show a loss."

From Bank of Munich:

"We urge you to do all you possibly can in favor of the Doctor Coulter bill. Many of our good farmers have suggested that we write you. You are also urged to do this by the request of all interested in this bank."

From Munich National Farm Loan Association:

"It was suggested at our recent stockholders' meeting that I write and urge you to do all in your power for the passage of the Doctor Coulter livestock loan bill."

From First Security Bank, Raleigh:

"On behalf of the business men of Raleigh, N. Dak., I write you relative to the livestock loan bill which is now or will be up in Congress. It is the desire of the local business men that you use your best efforts on behalf of the passage of this bill and to the end that it will be passed in time so the farmers can make feed preparations at seeding time. Personally, I believe this is the most important legislation which could possibly be brought up to benefit the Northwest permanently. Its effects will be lasting, and the relief afforded will be immeasurable."

From Turtle Lake Commercial Club:

"Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate, by Senator PETER NORBECK, of South Dakota, known as Senate bill 1597, and in the House of Representatives, by Representative O. B. BURTNESS, of North Dakota, known as House bill 4159, quoting a plan for agricultural relief and to speed up diversified farming in Minnesota, the Dakotas, and Montana, known as the $50,000,000 livestock loan bill; and

"Whereas this plan provides for a $50,000,000 revolving livestock loan fund to be advanced by the Government to farmers of the Northwest for the purchase of dairy and beef cattle, sheep, hogs, and poultry, making it possible for those who want and who are competent to diversify, but who are unable to finance the change; and

"Whereas the spring-wheat farmers of the Northwest have been losing an average of $5.63 per acre annually on wheat grown during the past five years, due to price deflation, increased cost of production, and poor yields, making it necessary for the farmer of the Northwest to diversify in order to be self-supporting; and

"Whereas this bill will meet the situation confronting the farmers of the Northwest: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be spread upon the minutes of this meeting, and the secretary be, and is hereby, instructed to mail a copy of this resolution to the above-named Senators and Representatives."

From Leal National Farm Loan Association:

"This bill, if passed, will, I believe, be of immense help to the Northwest, not only to the farmers but to everyone. I am writing this to let you know the sentiment here, not only of myself personally but also of the Leal National Farm Loan Association, and we earnestly urge you to do everything in your power to secure the passage of this worthy bill."

From Graves & Co., Carrington (farm lands and city property):

"May we urge the passing of the bill suggested by Doctor Coulter for loans to the farmers of this and adjoining States for the purpose of securing more and better livestock?"

From Merchants National Bank, Dickinson:

"The Dr. John Lee Coulter bill meets with general approval. Its aim, as we understand it, is to help the farmer help himself by working along the lines of diversification, which, generally speaking, is so much needed. With the purchase of cattle and sheep, any farmer should be able to build himself up and eventually become prosperous and happy. Livestock is looked upon as good security, and the Government would not be taking much chance in furnishing the money for its purchase, as proposed in the aforesaid bill.

"We look upon this as a construction measure which will mean much to the present and future of North Dakota, and we feel sure that the measure will receive the hearty support of our entire delegation in Congress."

From Farmers State Bank, Wo dworth:

"Our people are interested in the proposed bill No. 1597. Its benefits would be far-reaching and a consistent help to our agricultural people. We urge your constant efforts toward the passing of this measure with as little delay as possible."

From Kiwanis Club, Devils Lake:

"At the meeting of the Devils Lake Kiwanis Club, held at Devils Lake, N. Dak., January 22, 1924, the Coulter livestock loan bill was discussed, and it was unanimously voted that this club heartily approve it and respectfully suggests to the Congress of the United States the necessity of the relief proposed, and that this bill meets with the unanimous approval and support of the farmers, livestock growers, and the business and professional people of this part of the Northwest with whom our members are in touch."

From Farmers and Merchants National Bank, Jamestown:

"The Jamestown Clearing House, I think, has already wired or written you that we are in favor of the passage of the so-called Coulter plan. I think, in fact, anyone interested in giving the Northwest an opportunity is interested in this measure going through. It will certainly give a good many worthy fellows an opportunity to make good who at this time do not have the chances to avail themselves of greater factors."

From Cando Welfare Club:

"Be it resolved, That the Cando Welfare Club, consisting of 100 members made up of business men and farmers in and around Cando, at their regular meeting on the 4th day of February, 1924, did unanimously vote to petition Congress to speedily adopt without modification the $50,000,000 livestock revolving bill, for reasons that—

"1. Our people have been delayed in diversification past a point where they can help themselves or the banks can help them by having the livestock balance ruined through the plea of the United States Government to raise more wheat during the war;

"2. Only a loan, and not a gift, is asked;

"3. This bill will bring about a situation which will enable the farmers of our territory to at least make their own living on their own farms, which they are not doing now;

"4. It provides the start in breeding stock whereby the farmers can grow back their livestock balance to where it should be;

"5. More corn, alfalfa, sweet clover, and feed crops will be raised in place of wheat as the amount of livestock demands it."

Mr. President, I might quote hundreds of similar letters as indicating the demand for this legislation which is intended as an emergency measure for the aid of the farmers of the spring-wheat belt in an effort to restore these farmers to somewhat near the same parity as in other lines of agriculture, whose markets were not destroyed by a fixed maximum price for wheat while all others were permitted to profiteer off from the wheat farmer. It should be borne in mind, however, that permanent relief can only come through a stabilized market price that will insure the farmers the cost of production, plus a small profit, taken one year with another, the same as is assured to other lines of undertaking, and especially following a great crisis such as we have recently passed through in this country. It is fully realized by the promoters of this bill that it is only a temporary means to serve for two or three years to aid those farmers who are no longer in position to avail themselves of the regular source of credit now denied them, because they plunged patriotically into wheat growing on the appeal of their Government to help save world democracy, and are now forced to the wall because the Government fixed an unfair price for their crop—wheat—and then penalized the producers by withdrawing all forms of protection which they had a right to assume would be afforded them for their patriotic service.

To restore the wheat farmer of the West and of the Northwest spring-wheat belt to a parity with other branches of agriculture two things are essential:

1. To return something of the rightful profits of wheat of which the wheat farmer was deprived by governmental price fixing for his wheat, and which he was forced to produce at a heavy loss while all from whom he purchased his necessities were permitted to profiteer off the farmer during the same period. The so-called livestock loan bill, Senate bill 1597, will, if enacted into law and carefully administered directly with the farmers, in some measure accomplish this—that is, restore the wheat farmer to a parity with other parts of the country.

2. The farmer must receive a reasonable price, so as to enable him to have a small profit on what he produces, and through organization enable him to shorten the spread between the producer and the consumer by the elimination of some of the distribution expenses, to the benefit of both producer and consumer. Orderly marketing and the conversion of his bulky raw materials into finished products are essential for his success.

To my mind, the Norris-Sinclair bill or, better, a combination of this with the McNary-Haugen bill, is the best guaranty of permanently accomplishing this end of anything so far considered by Congress, and, above all, will stimulate cooperation on the part of the producers, will bring about cooperative marketing, and will meet with the least amount of opposition on the part of the opponents of the new order so essential for the reviyifying of a decadent agriculture in the United States. I hope, therefore, that the Norbeck bill may have early and favorable consideration by the Senate as a measure affording a considerable benefit to the farmers now in distress, and when taken together with a good marketing bill, which I trust may be passed at the present session of Congress, properly administered, will do much in the way of reestablishing a profitable agriculture. Since the Norbeck bill contains provisions for aid to other sections of the country where agriculture is badly depressed, the measure should have generous support, and when enacted into law prove highly beneficial in giving the farmers hope for better times.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I regret very much that I can not give my support to the pending measure. I think there are numerous objections to the bill; some of them, certainly, insurmountable. It is a mistake, in my judgment, to undertake by special legislation to meet local or varying conditions throughout the country. The measure is unsound in principle. It is going to the extreme limit of any power which we may have, if indeed it does not transcend any authority that vests in the Congress, to make appropriations for the purposes named in the bill. It is too much like a sort of patronizing generosity extended toward particular interests or an industry, a generosity in the use of other people's money. The Congress has no right to appropriate the money of the taxpayers of all the country in order to serve some particular local interest.

There are two views with reference to the proper method of remedying agricultural conditions. One is an economic view that the remedy lies along the lines of cooperation, wherein and whereby the farmers work out their own salvation. It would simply provide the machinery for them to serve themselves and accomplish good through their own efforts, unhampered and not discriminated against. The other view is that we must depend upon remedial legislation. Either of them, in my judgment, may be carried to the extreme. I have always had the view that there was legislation needed so as to put the great fundamental industry of the country—agriculture—upon a proper, sound, healthy basis. I have also held the view that cooperation was one of the prime means by which they could accomplish what was desired; in other words, a combination of both the economic view of cooperation and the view that remedial legislation was the remedy that should be resorted to, but extremes in either direction should be avoided. I think now we are launched upon an extreme effort to accomplish things by legislation which in my judgment can never be thus accomplished.

Perhaps in order to get a view of the situation we ought to reflect upon what has been done by Congress heretofore with respect to agriculture. I recall that as far back as 1912 I became fully impressed with the thought that this industry, which lies at the basis of all prosperity and strength and health in the Nation, was not treated fairly with respect, especially, to our financial institutions and system. At that time, as we know, we had a national bank law, establishing national banks, and our financial system was purely a commercial system. Under the law national banks were prohibited from making loans upon real estate, for instance. Real estate was the farmer's chief asset. National banks were required to keep assets liquid. It was not good banking to make long-time loans.

We had no system then that would accommodate agriculture. It amounted, in my judgment, to a clear discrimination against agriculture. The farmer could not get long-term accommodations through any institution we had established. He depended upon private capital for any accommodations that he required, and frequently could not get any loan at all on his real estate. When he went to negotiate short-term obligations, notes, bills, or acceptances, he had to pay whatever rate of interest the bank saw fit to charge him.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is it not true, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Florida, that the high rate of interest which was charged was largely upon money that had been deposited in the banking system by the farmers themselves?

Mr. FLETCHER. Unquestionably that was the case.

I became fully convinced that there was an obligation resting upon the Congress to establish a financial system that would meet the needs of agriculture, hence I became very much interested in that important subject. There was formed an American commission composed of two delegates appointed by the governors of the various States, respectively. There was also created the United States commission in pursuance of an act of Congress which provided for such a commission to be appointed by the President to cooperate with the American commission inaugurated under the auspices of the Southern Commercial Congress, for the purpose of studying the question of rural credits in the older countries of Europe where various systems had been in successful operation for from 50 to 100 years.

As chairman of both those commissions it became my duty, as it was my privilege—and to that I devoted my whole heart and soul—to ascertain in a practical way and just how we might fit in the system established under our laws with the methods and practices that had been pursued so successfully in the older countries of Europe. We made a study of all those systems, spending three months in direct contact with them. We made a report to Congress of something over a thousand pages. I introduced a bill and the commissions caused to be introduced a bill, and the matter was pursued vigorously, resulting finally, without going into the details, in the passage of the farm loan act. That was passed in 1916.

The farm-loan system was established to provide the capital needs of farmers, long-term credits, at a reasonable rate of interest, and upon terms which they could meet in the orderly process of their business. The result has been that a billion three hundred million dollars have been loaned to farmers in this country at 5½ per cent interest, with the right to pay off the principal at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, and with the further right to pay off any or all of the obligation in each case at any period after five years, and upon other terms practically of their own choice.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have read the very thorough and admirable report of the Senator's committee, but the farm loan act as administered up to date does not seem to me to come up to expectations of its accomplishment. Something over a billion—about a billion and three-quarters dollars—have been loaned through the land banks and the joint-stock land banks; but is it not true that the farmers want seven or eight billion dollars and perhaps nine billion dollars of such loans in order to take care of their just needs?

Mr. FLETCHER. As the Senator suggests, I think undoubtedly this business will expand; that the applications will come in, perhaps, more rapidly than they have done in the past, and that the system will grow. I believe that the farm-loan system, especially since there has been added to it the intermediate credit banks, is destined to become the greatest financial system in the world. There is not any doubt but that the farmers already owe some six or seven billion dollars, most of it secured by mortgage. All that can be liquidated under the farm-loan system, and borrowers can become applicants under that system and obtain the accommodation upon the terms provided by that system. One of the purposes specified for which loans can be procured is to pay off existing liens. The Senator will recall it required some months to organize the system, establish the 12 Federal land banks, and begin operations. Furthermore, very shortly after loans commenced suit was instituted in the United States courts, instigated by private mortgage concerns, opponents of the system, because it assured a reduction in interest rates and afforded a competition they did not relish, attacking the constitutionality of the act. While that suit was pending for some 18 months, and until the Supreme Court handed down its opinion holding the act constitutional throughout, in February, 1921, no bonds were offered and no loans were made. I consider the act has been ably and wisely administered and, all things considered, with marked success. It has proved a blessing to agriculture and will grow in usefulness unlimited if allowed to function as it should.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask if the Senator from Florida thinks the removal of certain of the cooperative features of the system in the last Congress was an advantage to the system? Would it not be better to develop the cooperative idea rather than to have a central control?

Mr. FLETCHER. Beyond any question, I think so. I think, as the Senator has suggested, it was most unfortunate to add to the intermediate credit act what is known as "Title III—Amendments to the farm loan act," taking practically the control of the Federal land banks out of the hands of the stockholders and vesting it in the Farm Loan Board. I think that was a great mistake, and I certainly should have opposed it had I been present. As the Senator knows, that legislation came into the Senate as a part of the conference report on what were known as the Lenroot-Capper bills.

The conferees added Title III as an amendment to those bills in the conference report, so that the Senate either had to concur in the conference report or the Lenroot bill and the Capper bill, and the provisions for the intermediate credit banks and the national agricultural credit corporations would have been defeated. Hence the legislation was agreed to in that way, and Title III, without having been considered by the Senate, became a part of the law in that extraordinary fashion, to which I think, had I been here, I should have been obliged to object. Unfortunately I was detained on account of a case of grippe which attacked me during the last few days of the session and I was not present. I think I should have been obliged to object to that legislation on the ground that it changed the fundamental law with respect to the organization of the farm loan system and the control of the Federal land banks. It was time the temporary organization of these banks should be terminated and we should have gone back to the original act, which provided there should be nine directors for each of the banks, three named by the Farm Loan Board and six elected by the stockholders represented by the national farm-loan associations. That, however, is the law.

I have introduced a bill, which is now pending before the Banking and Currency Committee, to repeal Title III of that act, passed at the close of the session, March 4, 1923. The Banking and Currency Committee are now considering that and other proposed amendments to the law, and it is to be hoped that there will be a restoration of the cooperative features of that system effected by subsequent legislation.

Mr. BROOKHART. I hope the Senator from Florida may succeed in that effort.

I should like to ask one additional question. The loans under the Federal farm loan act are based on bonds that are tax exempt, are they not?

Mr. FLETCHER. They are; those bonds are exempt from all taxation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does that, in the opinion of the Senator, reduce the interest rate to the farmers themselves?

Mr. FLETCHER. Unquestionably it does.

Mr. BROOKHART. In order that the farmers may have an equal proportion of tax-exempt bonds with cities and municipalities, is it not true that the amount of the farm loans should be increased to seven or eight billion dollars? Would not that be necessary before they would have their just proportion?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator's view about that is correct. There is not a shadow of doubt that if we destroy the tax-exempt feature of the farm-loan bonds we shall raise the rate of interest from 1 to 2 per cent to the borrower, and we shall not be able to make loans within the rate fixed by the law, namely, 6 per cent. The tax-exempt feature of those bonds, I will say to the Senator, inures to the advantage of the farmer, who is the borrower, because the law prohibits the banks from getting the benefit of the exemption, in that the banks can not charge the borrower exceeding 1 per cent above what the bonds sell for, so that necessarily the benefits go to the borrower and not to the Federal land banks, even though the borrowers are the stockholders of the Federal land banks.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under that situation if a constitutional amendment should be adopted prohibiting tax-exempt securities, it would not be fair unless it allowed the farm-loan banks to issue such an amount of bonds as would give the farmers their proportionate share of tax-exempt securities, would it?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator from Iowa is correct as to that. I expect later on to discuss the subject of the proposed constitutional amendment with reference to tax-exempt securities, if it comes up again. I am cordially opposed to it, because the very proposition originated with the land-mortgage banks that were assailing the tax-exempt feature of the farm-loan bonds, and if such a constitutional amendment should be adopted it would seriously cripple, if not destroy, the farm-loan system, because the Government of the United States would be obliged to tax farm-loan bonds in order to be able to tax State securities. The result would be the imposition of taxes upon farm-loan bonds, and, as I have said, would practically destroy the system. It is the tax-exempt feature that enables those bonds to sell at and above par, bringing from 4½ to 4¾ per cent interest.

Now we have established that system. We proceeded a little later on to extend the Federal reserve system so as to authorize securities maturing three to six months longer than before to be eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve banks. We extended that time very largely to help in orderly marketing agricultural products. We have established the intermediate credit banks for the purpose of affording short-term credit for farmers. We have provided for national agricultural credit corporations for the same reason.

We have provided that corporations or organizations or associations of farmers for the purpose of promoting the marketing of their products shall not be limited by any provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. We have provided five different measures of relief.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. The intermediate credit banks do not reach the individual farmers, except indirectly, do they?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think they have only issued some $40,000,000 of debentures up to this time, which have been largely utilized by cooperative associations and organizations.

Mr. BROOKHART. They have been used in rediscounting farm paper for the banks.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think they have been utilized by marketing and other similar cooperative agricultural associations or corporations.

Mr. BROOKHART. Would it not be a proper extension of that system to permit the establishment of direct cooperative banks to receive the deposits of farmers?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not so sure about that; that is an interesting question. I know the Senator is very much concerned about the cooperative bank plan, and I think he is, in the main, on the right track; but whether they could be connected with the intermediate credit banks and have the Government go directly into the banking business—for that is what it would mean—is a question to be considered.

Mr. BROOKHART. If we should amend the law so that those banks would have cooperative control, that would ultimately let the Government out of them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, if we could do that, it would be desirable; but if we provide for the Government running these institutions or even starting them, I question very much whether we will ever be able to get the grip of the Government off their throat. The idea, it seems to me, is that whenever the Government takes hold of a situation like that it reaches further and further, for more and more control, as in the case of the Federal land banks. The stockholders of those banks do not elect a majority of the directors, although we originally provided for that in the act. We have since provided that 3 of the directors shall be named by the Farm Loan Board, 3 shall be elected by the stockholders, and the stockholders shall nominate 3, from which number the Farm Loan Board selects 1, the board fixing the compensation of the directors, so that in effect it gives the Farm Loan Board control over the banks. Whether the Senator will ever be able to get a cooperative system so that the cooperators will control rather than those in command is a question.

Mr. BROOKHART. That will depend in part on whether we can secure the adoption of the Senator's amendment. If we can, I think probably we might develop the whole system by similar amendments. The Senator's amendment would furnish a start for a complete cooperative system.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will be glad to take that up when we get to it. However, I was outlining the history of what the Government has done in respect to agricultural credits. I believe we ought to proceed to lay down general principles and pass general legislation, and avoid so far as possible special legislation to meet particular or special conditions.

We have, as I said, established a farm-loan system. We have established the intermediate credit banks. We have provided for the organization of national credit corporations for marketing purposes. We have done other things in this direction. For instance, we have undertaken to influence prices through the use of Government authority. The regulation of important marketing agencies, such as the packers, the specific limitation of certain practices, such as the dealing in futures, the modification of freight rates in the interest of the producers, the limitation of certain middlemen's charges, and, last but not least, the enactment of a tariff—those are the things that we have done, with what result? In a general way I have mentioned the benefits that have arisen under the system known as the farm-loan system. Undoubtedly great benefits have resulted from this expansion of the Federal reserve system, and I believe benefits will result from this intermediate credit bank system and other things that we have done to place agriculture on an equal footing with other industries of the country and relieve it of adverse discrimination.

It seems to me we have gone about as far as we can go with safety in that direction. It is a dangerous thing for Congress to undertake to launch out and make appropriations to endeavor to bolster up or help out situations which arise in the course of events and which can not be cured by legislation, and yet these conditions exist. I accept the statement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] regarding conditions in the Dakotas and Minnesota and the Northwest. I have before me some letters written by Mr. B. F. Yoakum, who has been a student of this subject for some years and has written a good deal upon it, that are full of important information. His articles appeared in the New York Times. He says:

> When Col. C. H. March, of Litchfield, Minn., was summoned to Washington to report upon the agricultural situation to President Coolidge, he was reported as saying to the President, among other things:
> "A gloomy picture of the agricultural situation is the only one that I can present. The wheat farmer is not the only one in trouble. Virtually every farmer is in a bad predicament and facing ruin. The farmers find themselves unable not only to pay their taxes and debts, but can't pay their interest."

Further, he says:

> Summing up my observations with these farmers confirms the truth of what I have often asserted, absolutely beyond doubt, that the prices the consumers are paying are from 100 to 1,200 per cent over the prices the farmers receive. Here I want to remark that the broader the scope and the closer investigations I make the more startling is the enormous difference between the farmers' and consumers' prices.

In another instance he says:

The difference between my position and Mr. Wallace's lies in the fact that for a $7,500,000,000 crop, farm value, the consumer pays $22,500,000,000, while I contend that there should be a readjustment under which the farmers will receive two-thirds of the $22,500,000,000, or $15,000,000,000 paid by the consumers instead of one-third, or $7,500,000,000.

To put it another way, Secretary Wallace's proposition is to save the farmers annually $184,000,000. Under my plan the farmers' present income would be increased from $7,500,000,000 to $15,000,000,000 a year.

I do not want to be understood as arguing against a reduction in freight rates. That is a matter for the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine. I am only drawing the comparison of two suggested methods of aiding the farmer—one a mere bagatelle, the other a broad, substantial, and permanent way to make the agricultural industry of the Nation profitable and place it upon a permanent and lasting basis.

The farmers can charge off all of the $730,000,000 freight bill, which, after all, is less than 10 per cent of the $7,500,000,000 now wrongfully taken by others from the products of their investment and labor. The idea that I am trying to convey is that the farmers now pay a freight bill of $730,000,000 a year. It is also costing them to pay the cost of distribution, through profits, commissions, etc., $7,500,000,000. Therefore if from an accounting standpoint they charge off their whole freight bill, they would still be ahead $6,750,000,000 under my plan.

* * * * * * *

In my investigations and estimates I have used values at the farm, as reported by the Department of Agriculture, of food articles aggregating $7,500,000,000.

Evidently, therefore, the situation is not at all satisfactory. There is great depression in agriculture in many portions of the country. The remedy suggested by Mr. Yoakum is to reduce the spread between the farm and the breakfast table by establishing a better system of distribution.

Another proposed remedy is to broaden our markets by reaching the markets overseas and abroad. For instance, as stated by another authority:

Unparalleled distress has come to American farmers since the World War. Part of this national calamity is due to the long-continued economic and political disorders of Europe, which have impaired the power of valued customers to purchase farm products.

And that is confirmed in a way by action taken by farm organizations.

The American Farm Bureau Federation, in December, 1923, said:

We urge the immediate adoption by the American Government of a vigorous foreign policy designed to carry out America's obligations resulting from her war aims and the terms of the armistice which ended the war, and thus to restore peace and prosperity to Europe.

The American National Livestock Association, in January, 1924, said:

The principle of isolation is incompatible with world commerce; * * * the stabilization of European finances is of the first importance as a factor in the restoration of our own prosperity.

Then the Farmers' National Council in January, 1924, expressed similar sentiments, all suggesting what they regard as a possible remedy.

The actual condition as pictured is most appealing. In some of the States there are vast areas of lands which are now utilized in the growing of wheat which will produce nothing but wheat. It is impossible to provide for any system of diversification there, because these lands will not produce anything of consequence but wheat. They are not good for grazing; they are not suitable for the production of corn, or potatoes, or other products; and there is no way that I can see in which the Government should appropriate money to encourage diversification where only one crop is possible, and there is no sense in appropriating money to stimulate additional efforts to increase production of wheat on lands where the producers admit it can not be done profitably.

This condition in the Northwest, as related by Senators and by Mr. Yoakum, is rather inconsistent with that we hear a good deal about once in a while, and sometimes in the newspapers, to the effect that the country is very prosperous, that everything is going on splendidly, that everybody is happy, and conditions are all fine. Nevertheless, we must accept the statement of the Senator from North Dakota and of these authorities on this subject as to agriculture. I am informed that some 43 industrial plants between Philadelphia and Wilmington are practically closed; that the Baldwin Locomotive Works have reduced their force from 12,000 to 1,800, and are working only three days a week; so I am disposed to question this propaganda in regard to the prosperity of the country and the delightful conditions that exist everywhere.

There is, however, another view of this situation, even in the Northwest. I have here an article by Mr. Roger W. Babson, who writes now from Florida. Many of the country's leading and prosperous citizens find their way to Florida, some of them not forced to go there at all, but influenced by considerations of pleasure and health and general satisfaction, and are acquiring homes down there. Mr. Babson writes from Babson Park, Fla., as follows:

When in Minnesota recently I made a statistical analysis of each of the Western Central States, comparing sources of purchasing power and relative conditions. It is generally understood that crops provide the major portion of the income of this section and that manufacturing plays a relatively small part. In general, this is true, but the increase in manufacturing has been very rapid recently, and our old conceptions must be corrected if we are to think constructively regarding this section.

* * * * * * *

Analyzing the situation a bit further, we uncover another mistaken impression. I find that business men in other parts of the country, at least, discuss this section as "the wheat country," and talk as though they assumed that wheat was the most important crop if not the greatest source of income. From an agricultural standpoint the figures on the relative importance of this crop are decidedly interesting. In North Dakota and Kansas only do we find it as the most important crop. In South Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa, and Missouri corn provides a greater income and is more important to the prosperity of a local community. Analyzing the situation in Minnesota, I find that wheat represents but 17 per cent of farm products, while 23 per cent is derived from hay, 22 per cent from corn, 13 per cent from oats, and 25 per cent from miscellaneous products.

* * * * * * *

Every year when traveling through these States I find more and more capital being invested in manufacturing, mining, and other than agricultural activities. The principal industrial plants as yet are confined to milling and slaughtering industries directly connected with agriculture. Canning factories are being erected at a rapid rate; dairies are increasing; and the lumber industry still plays an important part.

* * * * * * *

It is true that fundamentally these Western States are better off to-day than ever before. Their crops are more diversified; they are continuing to manufacture a greater variety of goods, and they are accumulating more capital. The one weak point in the situation, if there is one, lies in the inability of this section to market its products on a satisfactory basis, although this same criticism may be applied to several other sections of the country as well. The present systems are not operating effectively and I thoroughly believe that the difficulty can be remedied by working along the line suggested by the four basic principles of merchandising, which may be outlined briefly as follows:

1. An excessive supply of any product, either manufactured or agricultural, tends to lower its price.

There is no question about that. It is largely a matter here, therefore, of overproduction. You must control the production before you can expect to control the price of these products. If there is an overproduction of a commodity, that necessarily will lower the price; or if there is a bad practice, improper plan of distribution of a commodity, even though the production is not in excess of the demand, that will tend to lower the price of the commodity.

First, then, we must consider this question of overproduction.

2. The customer must be given the product he wants, not the product we happen to want to make or raise for him.

3. The desired goods must be got to the consumer quickly and cheaply. This can best be accomplished by informing the distributing machinery afforded by modern advertising and merchandising developments.

He discusses each of this. I only mention the heads.

4. Borrow as little as possible instead of as much as possible. Interest charges constitute a fixed burden that must not be any larger than is absolutely necessary if the farmer or business man is to progress as he should.

I stop here to say that I think we have provided all the means for credit required to promote and establish a sound and healthy agriculture. I think it would be disastrous to the farmer to encourage borrowing to any greater extent than we have made easy for him and given him the facilities for doing under the systems we have established. There may be some additions or changes which will make more efficacious the general plans already adopted. Several years ago, largely at the instance of the then Senator from North Dakota [Mr. Gronna], who was chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the predecessor of the distinguished Senator who spoke to-day, we passed a bill providing for an appropriation of some $5,000,000 to purchase seed to supply the farmers in the Wheat Belt with grain to sow a new crop. That was a loan, in a way, but, so far as I am advised, only a small portion of it has ever come back to the Government.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield. I will be glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. McNARY. I think the Senator is in error as to the total of the loans to the farmers. Two million dollars was loaned to the farmers of North Dakota. Then, at a later time, through the agricultural appropriation bill, a million dollars was loaned to the farmers of Montana. In one instance 68 per cent has been returned to the Government, and in the other instance 62 per cent, so the total unpaid now of all these various sums is 33 per cent, 63 per cent having been paid.

Mr. FLETCHER. But that 33 per cent, I presume, is past due?

Mr. McNARY. Yes; it is past due.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is better than I supposed. I made some inquiry the other day, and I was unable to get the actual figures, but the report to me was that very little of it had come back to the Government. I scarcely expect much of this to come back to the Government if it is loaned to the farmers, because I think it really ought not to be expected that the Government would realize on a transaction of this sort. No business man would consider it as a business proposition. There is no adequate protection to the Government. The alleged security is a pretense.

Mr. Babson further says:

I am in favor of all legislation making it easy for the farmers and fruit growers to extend their present loans so as to avoid foreclosure, but I am very fearful of the result of making it easy for any people to borrow more money. I believe that the Federal farm loan banks and the other "cure-all" schemes are ultimately going to get the farmers into a lot of trouble if they are not administered with extreme caution. Too much money has been borrowed in the past to be put into nonproductive things. Farmers have speculated too much in land, and, in their case, if I may paraphrase the Bible, it is literally true that "borrowed money is the root of all evil."

In another statement, appearing in the New York Times of March 2, it is said:

READJUSTMENT IN THE FARMING NORTHWEST—TURNS TO DIVERSIFIED PRODUCTION AS WHEAT REACHES PRE-WAR PRICES.

The Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis states in its monthly bulletin as of the end of February that—

> "additional evidence comes to hand almost daily that substantial readjustment is now under way in the wheat-raising areas of this district. That the prices of agricultural products have practically reached pre-war levels is a generally recognized fact. However, a comparison with the price readjustment which followed the Civil War furnishes a very interesting commentary on the present trend of prices both for agricultural products and for the things which farmers must purchase.
> "These price changes are bringing about a revolution in the methods and plans of farmers in this section. Figures recently made available show that there has been an increase of more than 12 per cent in milk cows, 38 per cent in swine, and more than 10 per cent in sheep held in this district as compared with three years ago, and this is a much greater increase than has taken place for the United States as a whole.
>
> "There has also been a reawakening of interest in promoting diversification, crop rotation, better tillage, the study of markets, dairying, and animal breeding. The situation generally has not been so bad throughout this section during the past three years as to prevent an increased density of automobile ownership as compared with population."

That is perhaps a rather more rosy view than is quite justified, but it is another side of this picture.

John Reid, of Racine, Wis., head of the Reid Farm Implement Manufacturinig Co., recently stated that—

> The farm implement business lacks considerable of being a business at the present time, due to the inability of farmers to purchase new equipment.
> They find it possible, always, to buy an automobile, but not a plow.

The farmer, especially the farmer of the Northwest, has been facing a difficult situation, but I am inclined to blame the farmer. They place entirely too much dependence in one crop. The same condition is true in the South—or has been at least until recent years when a marked improvement is being shown. They depend, in Georgia and other Southern States, upon cotton. In the Northwest they base all their hope on wheat. When the prices are high they have no wheat and they have no cotton. When prices are low they have too much wheat and they have too much cotton, and as a result they never have any money.

> Diversified farming, dependence upon more than one crop, or type of crop, will establish the American farmer on a basis which he should never be thrown from, and that day is approaching.

I am not disposed to blame the farmer. I do think there is a great deal in this thought that the farmer needs to change from the one-crop idea and proceed to diversification, not only in the Northwest but everywhere else in this country.

The farmer has been devoting himself to his work very much as it grew upon him. He has followed in the footsteps of the past, very largely. He has been somewhat in a rut and, as some one has said, a rut is a grave with both ends knocked out. He is generally a conservative citizen. He has loads of common sense. He is acquainted with hardship. He is patriotic. He loves his country. He believes in law and order. He is an ideal citizen. He is the gentleman who produces the Nation's food. All food, for animal and for man, must come from the land, energized by the sun. The farmer lives nearest the fountain of life in the divine economy. I am not casting any aspersions upon him at all. I have been for years doing everything I could to advance his interests and to give him a fair deal, and that is all he has ever asked. He has not been coming to Congress hat in hand asking for these doles and these hand-outs which have been suggested in certain directions now. All he wants is to be treated fairly and squarely, just as other industries, just as other workers are treated.

It is proposed in this bill to do what? The bill is entitled—

> To promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war, and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat.

"Stimulation of wheat production during the war" is past. Some comment has been made about governmental interference, about what the farmer would have made if the Government had not gone in and fixed the price of his wheat.

Mr. President, we all remember that the farmers came here and asked to have that thing done. It was all done at the instance and request of the wheat growers. If it had not been done, there is no telling what price they would have gotten for their wheat. The Government guaranteed a minimum of $2.20 a bushel, and subsequently that was increased to $2.36 a bushel. Now wheat is selling for less than $1 a bushel.

The farmers wanted that step taken by the Government, appealed to the Government to take it, and it was taken at considerable risk. It so happened afterwards that we made gifts to Russia and gifts to countries in the Near East and other countries, and took this grain which the Federal Grain Corporation had accumulated to supply those needs. We created a market ourselves which ran up the price of wheat. That was the situation, and that step was taken, which fixes no blame upon the Government, but it was done then to save the wheat growers, so far as possible, and to serve them.

Now we say we are going to pass this bill so as to correct this condition "aggravated by many years of small yields." Will somebody tell me how Congress can pass a law that will increase the yield of wheat on the farms of the country? Will somebody suggest how Congress can legislate so as to give greater crops, more productive yields? Clearly that is a matter that can not be reached by legislation.

The next situation needing relief is "high production costs of wheat." Are you going to cure that by legislation? How can we pass a law that will reduce the cost of producing wheat? That is one trouble with this thing. Therein lies the danger in this kind of legislation, in my judgment. Congress undertakes by making an appropriation of $50,000,000 a year to correct the small yield of wheat in the one instance and to lower the cost of production in the other. That is the purpose set out in this bill, apparently, and if that is to be done, then the next thing we will have will be perhaps a proposal that Congress shall fix the wages which shall be paid on the farms, and that Congress shall fix the price the farmer shall pay for his cultivators and for his harvesters. Where are you going to end that sort of thing?

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. As I understand, the purpose of this bill is not, as stated by the distinguished Senator, to increase the yield of wheat, but rather for the purpose of enabling the farmer to diversify, so that it will not be necessary to have only one crop; and also, perhaps, enable him to decrease the production of wheat in keeping with the market.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was reading from the title of the bill. I was using the exact language the bill gives us, "to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected"—by what? By "the stimulation of wheat production during the war, aggravated by small yields and high production costs." Now, we propose to cure those.

Mr. BURSUM. The Senator, of course, appreciates that those statements are more or less recitals of things which occurred that caused the ills from which the farmer is now suffering.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that perfectly well. The Senator who just interrupted me has proposed an amendment to the bill since it was reported to the Senate providing for an appropriation of $20,000,000 more "in order to stabilize banks and trust companies within agricultural districts, States, or communities wherein public confidence in such financial concerns has become impaired on account of conditions," and so forth. So there we are, with $50,000,000 to be advanced to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to go out over the land and buy cows and pigs and sheep and goats and chickens, probably buying from these same people who now want the accommodations, and after he has them all corraled then he will sell them out at cost to the amount of a thousand dollars each to the farmers, respectively. The Secretary is then to take a lien on those chickens and hogs to secure the return of the money, and the farmer, of course, in the meantime having an abundant right and wanting to live, will be under the necessity of eating the chickens and the hogs.

I am talking now about the wild proposals here, as they seem to me. We have then proposed to be added to that another $25,000,000 to go somewhere else outside the wheat region to bring about diversification. Wherever the people are practicing the one-crop system throughout the land let us take $25,000,000 and go down there and tell them, "You have to diversify; you have to go out and instead of planting all cotton you must plant some corn and some wheat and some potatoes and some beans and some sugar corn, and that sort of thing, and we will loan you the money to do it." Then along comes the Senator from New Mexico and proposes to put in $20,000,000 to bolster up busted banks and trust companies.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. I want the distinguished Senator from Florida to understand that that is the best part of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not any doubt the Senator thinks that, and really there is some basis for argument in favor of the amendment that does not exist in favor of the original bill. I agree to that. But, Mr. President, here we have a proposition of $50,000,000 to the wheat growers, $25,000,000 to the one-crop farmers, which makes $75,000,000, and then $20,000,000 more for loans to banks that need bracing up, that have violated banking laws and lost the confidence of the depositors and are about to be closed up. The Comptroller of the Currency is to take that $20,000,000 down there and help those institutions out. A proposal to help the banks in connection with farmers. Where are we going to pour out the taxpayers' money next? That is $95,000,000 proposed already in the bill, and the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] the other day got a million dollars to help the farmers down in New Mexico. Where are we going to stop with this thing? Has the Congress the right to vote away the money of the taxpayers of the country in that fashion to be used, for instance, $75,000,000 by the Secretary of Agriculture to go out over the land and find where he can place the money? Of course if the idea is to provide a good campaign fund it can be made very effective in the next election. I would not venture to suggest that thought, but the possibilities are simply enormous. Twenty million dollars out in the West properly handled during the next campaign ought to bring big results. Seventy-five million dollars properly handled ought to carry the next election.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BURSUM. The Senator does not seriously desire to have the Senate believe that any administration or any party would be so infamous as to undertake to capitalize the distress and the suffering of the country for political purposes?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, Mr. President, I merely suggest that by way of a possibility without indicating that that sinister purpose is what the gentlemen have in mind who have the bill under direction, but we do know perfectly well that the Secretary of Agriculture has all the work he can attend to right here in Washington. There come over his desk day after day all the problems and all the serious questions that he can solve and attend to without it being possible for him to devote himself to going over the country to administer the $75,000,000 fund. Of course, it means that he would have to employ a number of agents and representatives and send them out in every direction to handle the fund, to conserve it, if you please, to place it where it ought to go, and then to accept the liens in such form as he shall see proper to enable him to administer, through this extra force, the $75,000,000. Of course, he would have to do it pretty quickly, too. The Secretary of Agriculture can not do it. He would have to establish a regular bureau to handle the fund.

In the case of the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from New Mexico, the Comptroller of the Currency is to handle the fund. The Comptroller of the Currency has his hands full, too. But it is expressly provided in the proposed amendment that he shall have a $100,000 expense allowance to administer the $20,000,000 fund "to stabilize bank and trust companies within agricultural districts, States, or communities wherein public confidence in such financial concerns has become impaired." The Comptroller of the Currency is to take the $20,000,000 and restore confidence in those institutions. Why, Mr. President, we can not cure this situation by legislation, by making appropriation out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr President, here we have a proposition of $50,000,000 to the wheat growers, $25,000,000 to the one-crop farmers, which makes $75,000,000, and then $20,000,000 more for loans to banks that need bracing up, that have violated banking laws and lost the confidence of the depositors and are about to be closed up. The Comptroller of the Currency is to take that $20,000,000 down there and help those institutions out. A proposal to help the banks in connection with farmers. Where are we going to pour out the taxpayers' money next? That is $95,000,000 proposed already in the bill.

In a very interesting article in the proceedings of the Academy of Political Science for January, 1924, entitled "Agricultural credit problems," Mr. W. F. Gephart said quite truly:

> But the farmer will make a mistake if he pins too much faith to the acts of government and laws in the hope that they will solve his problems. The efficacy of law with respect to fundamental economic matters has always been overemphasized in popular thinking. It is difficult to believe that the intelligent farmer places much faith in many of the panaceas which are being advanced by his assumed official or unofficial spokesmen.

Affording a means for the farmer to get deeper into debt is not going to help the situation. Loaning him money to buy some hogs and cattle to put on land that never was grazing land and never will be grazing land is not going to help him. Loaning him money to diversify crops when the land he is cultivating will produce but one kind of a crop is not going to help him.

> Certainly much of what is being advocated for the benefit of the farmer will bring him no relief.
>
> Contrary to the popular belief and prevalent statements from many farmers and their friends, the essential difficulty in the agricultural situation is not one of credit. Few, if any, industrial classes have had more abundant credit than the farmer. In truth, he has at times had too much of it. But the late and present difficulty of the farmer is one of prices and not of credit—that is, as compared with the general price level, the price of farm products fell faster and still continues on a lower level than the prices of the goods which the farmer must buy.
> It is stated that one of the chief uses to which greater credit facilities would be put would be a reduction in the spread between what the farmer gets and what the consumer pays for farm products. However desirable it is to reduce the spread between what the consumer pays and what the farmer gets for his produce, it should not be forgotten that the present complicated organization of distribution, with its many classes of middlemen, is a process of natural economic development and not the result of wicked conspiracy of any class seeking to rob the farmer.
> If the farmer, through his associations or individually, expects to assume the rôle of a risk taker—that is, engages in the speculative holding of his produce—he must understand that this is likely to be in the nature of a two-edged sword. He must realize that this has become the function of a speculator or risk taker, and that it is a highly specialized kind of work for which neither the training of the farmer nor his daily work as a producer fits him. Moreover, contrary to common belief, the rewards of such risk taking are not as great as is popularly supposed. Over a long period of years, if due allowance is made for interest upon the capital employed, wages, salaries, rents, and other ordinary costs of operation, there is left for any one of such operators no excessive amount of what can properly be called pure speculator's profit. * * *

Neither Government, nor laws, nor banks make credit. There is need not only for the farmer but for many other classes of business citizens to understand better the fundamental bases of credit and the relation of banks to it.

The cooperative idea is a most excellent one. I believe thoroughly in cooperation. I believe that idea of the cooperative associations of the Northwest resulting in the establishment of elevators was splendid. Some of them have failed. Some of the elevators did not serve as they were expected to serve—quite true; and why? It was because the elevators established in different localities through the cooperative organizations competed with each other just as the farmers compete individually with each other. What was needed was the establishment of a central agency which would have coordinated all the elevators in that region, and that agency should tie up with agencies in other parts of the country, and then that central agency could have fixed the price of the commodity. The basis of cooperation must be upon the commodity and not upon the organization in the different localities. What was needed was to tie up all those different elevators located in the different places by cooperative associations with one central agency and then the problem would have been solved. The wheat could have been held back until it was wanted. Then it could have been moved when and where the demand, at a fair price, existed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. We tried to do that in the Northwest, but the chamber of commerce was too strong for us.

Mr. FLETCHER. The chamber of commerce too strong?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, I hope the farmers will get sufficiently strong that the chambers of commerce will not be able to overcome their plan. Chambers of commerce ought to realize that their prosperity and the prosperity of their members depends upon the prosperity at last of the farmer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. If the Senator from Florida will read the decision of the Federal Trade Commission that was published here just about a month ago, he will find something with reference to the fight that the farmers have had in trying to establish their own agencies in the Northwest in the business of selling grain.

Mr. FLETCHER. I shall be very glad to read that at the first opportunity. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I think it would be very interesting to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I repeat that I am much obliged to the Senator from Minnesota, and I shall undertake to read it.

What does the proposed legislation on this subject mean? Further paternalism, further centralization of power in the Federal Government. Do Senators suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture is going to handle $75,000,000 of the people's money without putting his hand on the industry that is thus being supported? Do Senators suppose the Comptroller of the Currency is going to use $20,000,000 without the necessity of additional agents and machinery and employees and further control? On that subject I should like to submit a thought which is found in Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler's very excellent book, entitled "Building the American Nation." At page 282 the author states:

The agents and officers of the National Government are in almost every community and in almost every place of business. In number they have multiplied manyfold, and, consequently, the cost of maintaining the National Government has advanced by leaps and bounds. Where 50 years ago the appearance of an official bearing credentials from Washington was a rare event and occurred only in connection with the Postal Service, the Customs Service, or the collection of internal revenue from tobacco and alcoholic liquors, that appearance is now an everyday occurrence. It may relate either to some large public interest or to the most intimate details in the administration of a national bank, a railway, an industrial corporation, or to the food and drink and medicine of the humblest household.

We are adding to these agencies; we are reaching out now to every farmer in the country, so that when the farmer gets up in the morning he is confronted with a Federal agent who accompanies him all through his daily tasks until he goes to bed at night. A farmer is a liberty-loving citizen, and he does not believe in being supervised all day long and even at night. However, that is the effect of this sort of legislation. I say I very much question whether under the Constitution we have the power or authority granted to us to do this sort of thing.

I refer, just for a moment, to another instructive work which has recently come under my observation entitled "Our changing Constitution," by Mr. Charles W. Pierson. Mr. Pierson says:

What, then, of the future? Is the Constitution hopelessly out of date? Are the States to be submerged and virtually obliterated in the drift toward centralization? No thoughtful patriot can view such a possibility without the gravest misgivings. The integrity of the States was a cardinal principle of our governmental scheme. Abandon that and we are adrift from the moorings which to the minds of statesmen of past generations constituted the safety of the Republic.

* * * * * * *

There is another aspect of the matter, however. The burden of Federal bureaucracy is beginning to be felt by the average man. He is being regulated more and more, in his meats and drinks, his morals and the activities of his daily life, from Washington. If he will only stop and think, he must realize that no one central authority can supervise the daily lives of a hundred million people, scattered over half a continent, without becoming top-heavy. He must realize, too, that even if such a centralization of power and responsibility were humanly possible, our National Government is unsuited for the task. The electorate is too numerous and heterogeneous; its interests and needs are too diverse. Shall the conduct of citizens of Mississippi be prescribed by vote of Congressmen from New York or supervised at the expense of New York taxpayers? Will an educational system suitable for Massachusetts necessarily fit the young of Georgia? Such suggestions carry their own answer. In the very nature of things there is bound to be a reaction against centralization sooner or later. The real question is whether it will come in time to save the present constitutional scheme.

The makers of the Constitution never intended that the people of one State should regulate or pay for supervising the conduct of citizens of another State. They made a division of governmental powers between Nation and State along broad and obvious lines. To the Federal Government were intrusted matters of a strictly national character—foreign relations, interstate commerce, fiscal and monetary system, post office, patents and copyrights. Everything else was reserved to the States or the people. Here was a scheme at once explicit and elastic.

* * * * * * *

The present tendency toward centralization can not go on indefinitely. A point must be reached sooner or later when an overcentralized government becomes intolerable and breaks down of its own weight. As an eminent authority has put it, "If we did not have States we should speedily have to create them." The States thus created, however, would not be the same. They would be mere governmental subdivisions without the independence, the historic background, the traditions, or the sentiment of the present States. These influences, hitherto so potent in our national life, would have been lost.

* * * * * * *

Will the people see these things in time? Americans with pride in their country's past and confidence in her future dare not say no. The awakening may be slow. Currents of popular will are not readily turned. It is hard to make the people think. But if leaders and teachers do their part American intelligence and prudence will assert themselves, and the slogan of an awakened public sentiment may yet be, "Back to the Constitution!"

I have attempted to present the thought that there is already established these permanent institutions, which are working in a satisfactory manner, by which the farmer can get the financial accommodation which he requires. We have at various times passed laws intending to put him upon an equal footing with all those engaged in other industries in the country. The remedy for his present ills can not be met by legislation of this kind. Some suggest that the means of relief lie along broadening foreign markets; some suggest that he must devise a better system of cooperation for distribution of his products.

There is one other thought, with which I propose to close these scattering observations, that ought to be urged in this connection. It is just as important to the farmer to have the cost of the things which he must buy reduced as it is to have the price of the things he has to sell increased. Under what difficulty is he laboring? I have before me the North American Review of February, 1924, in which, at page 198, is an article by Mr. C. Reinold Noyes, under the title "Economic policies of the United States." In that article I find this statement:

The natural exports of this country are:

1. The exportable surplus of native raw materials, together with such partly manufactured products as are normally refined or prepared at or near the source for the sake of economy in transportation. Such refined products are meat, gasoline, lumber, etc. These exports may be natural even when the native supply of materials for refining is supplemented by imports of raws, as occurs with wheat, flour, refined copper, and leather.

2. The exportable surplus of the products of manufacture which are not native because of some exclusive character or advantage, or which can be sold below world competition because of the peculiar economies of our mass mechanical production.

The natural imports of the United States are:

1. Raw or partially refined materials, not indigenous to the United States, or supplemental supplies of native materials. To these must be added monopoly manufactures of foreign lands made from materials which can not be obtained at home, like burlap and flax fiber textiles.

2. Manufactures where manual labor represents a large portion of the cost, or where especial and traditional skill is required for the perfection of the product.

Mr. Reinold Noyes says further at page 200:

Another characteristic of our foreign trade which it is essential to recognize is that it is largely three-cornered. We export the bulk of our raw or refined products to industrial Europe. Europe exports manufactures to the agricultural world. The agricultural world exports its raw materials to us. Of our raw exports 75 per cent goes to Europe. Of our raw imports 90 per cent comes from the agricultural regions, including our neighbors. This current is to some extent short-circuited. Of the smaller part of our imports—manufactured goods—75 per cent comes from industrial Europe. And of the smaller part of our exports—manufactured goods—75 per cent goes to the agricultural world.

So long as the United States continues to have so large a proportion of its exportable surplus in the form of raw or refined materials it must find its principal foreign customers in Europe. For Europe is the only large consumer of imported food and raw materials. Europe will, in turn, pay us so far as she can in travelers' expenses and services and in such handmade and exclusive manufactures as we allow to enter through our tariff wall.

I quote next from page 203:

The farmer is suffering from the tariff because it has destroyed his market by eliminating a large part of the imports which the foreigner could pay for our exports; because it establishes an artificial level of prices on the goods the farmer buys, both directly on protected products and indirectly on all other products and services through the induced high labor costs; and finally because he must sell at world price levels his whole output of every product of which there is any exportable surplus. The market price of most agricultural produce is established by the price of the marginal increment.

The owners of natural resources suffer from the same limitation of exports. And their own opportunities in the export markets are curtailed as well by the high labor costs caused by competition for a limited supply of labor with industries which have been artificially created by protection. Among the manufacturers, those who are not protected are in exactly the same position as the farmers and the owners of natural resources. They gain nothing from protection and lose on all scores.

The tariff that limits the importation of foreign goods, and thereby allows the American manufacturer to add the tax and more to his goods, is not only undemocratic and unwise but it destroys the chances of selling the surplus of our goods and products to foreign countries. They can not buy from us unless we buy from them. The whole world needs a fair and reasonable means of exchange.

In the proceedings of the Academy of Political Science, to which I have referred, I wish to quote a little further from page 22 of the article by Mr. B. H. Hibbard, entitled "The relation of government to agricultural marketing." He says:

The last topic to be considered under indirect control of price is the tariff. No sooner had the war ended than the inevitable clamor for protection arose. We had been on a free-trade basis, respecting nearly all agricultural produce, but with the opening up of traffic with the ends of the earth it was at once evident that the prices of 1918 to 1919 were bound to tumble. The farmer had come to believe that a tariff was efficacious in raising the prices of steel products, of textiles, and of boots and shoes. Why, then, would it not perform a like service if applied to wheat, corn, butter, and pork? Of course, it is effective in relation to wool and sugar. Just how an import tariff on an exported article is to raise the price has not been revealed to any careful student of the subject, but to the candidate for the Senate from a northwestern State it is as visible as the traditional band wagon, or as a drum major in a parade. It does not occur to these gentlemen that it may well happen that wheat may, because of a tariff, be lower at some western Canadian village than across in North Dakota without contributing to the higher level in the latter market. In other words, it does not seem evident to many of our politicians that so long as we are on a world-market basis the exact amount exported is of minor moment.

The alacrity with which the Congressmen of the manufacturing districts took off their coats and came to the farmer-tariff logrolling furnished a scene to be remembered. Only one item of any importance was omitted. We have no tariff on upland cotton, yet it might have been had for the asking, and the present price of cotton has been cited to prove its value. The wool tariff is doing its duty in keeping the price of wool high. Sugar has shown its independence of the amount of protection proffered and risen superior to it. In the case of certain grades of our hard spring wheat there is normally a shortage, hence protection actually operates in keeping the differential between this and softer wheats wider than it otherwise would be. On such important products as the bulk of the wheat, corn, hogs, beef cattle, and dairy products the tariff schedules are about as important as were the incantations used in the manufacture of the Damascus blade. Similarly the farmer believes in the tariff as the smith who tempered the steel in the ancient shop had faith in incantations. The relation of the Government to marketing with respect to the tariff on agricultural products may be flimsy from the standpoint of economic reasoning, but viewed politically the relationship is a powerful one.

* * * * * * *

While it has never been the policy in this country to subsidize farmer marketing companies, it has been proposed, and in Canada it has been done. In Alberta and Saskatchewan government money was lent to local cooperatives with which to build elevators. In Manitoba the government built, and for some years owned, elevators. These have since, with few exceptions, been sold to a cooperative company. In the United States the raising of the funds for building the elevators has not been a determining factor in their success or failure.

On page 25 he says:

The real trouble with the farmer, beyond all others combined, is his inability to reduce his output with the fall in demand. No matter in what terms it is put, the sum and substance of the farmers' lack of prosperity during the past three or four years is overproduction. It may be that more food than ever before is needed in accordance with the number of people. The nightmare of Europe is people without food; with us it is inability to digest the food we have. There is too much of it.

The Government is concerned over the surplus of agricultural produce, especially wheat. To urge a lowering of production is hardly within its province, yet with good grace it can suggest turning from one product to another. Under strong political pressure the Government has recently advised a radical reduction in the acreage of wheat.

Further, on this subject of the tariff and the increased price to the farmer of everything he has to buy by reason of it, in this same volume there is an article by Mr. Benjamin M. Anderson, jr., entitled "The tariff in relation to agriculture and foreign trade." On page 78 he says:

The futility of protective tariffs on articles of which we produce a substantial export surplus in the United States ought to be apparent without argument. The only way in which a protective tariff can raise prices for producers is by limiting the supply inside the tariff wall. If, however, there is produced inside the tariff wall more than can be consumed there of a given product, as is the case with wheat, corn, cotton, hogs, and most other agricultural products in the United States, the only effect which a tariff can have is to make inconvenience. It can not benefit the general body of producers. On the other hand, by checking in some measure the inflow of manufactured gobds from Europe, it has made the prices of manufactured goods, which he has to buy, higher than they would otherwise have been. The present tariff legislation thus injures the farmer's selling markets and makes his buying markets less advantageous than they otherwise would be.

In addition, the absurd tariffs on wheat and cattle have brought about positive embarrassment to farmers and others in striking ways. At the Minnesota Bankers' Convention in 1921, grave concern was expressed over the losses to Minneapolis and other milling interests through their inability to import and grind up Canadian grain which formerly had come to them for milling, while dairy interests in Minnesota, Wisconsin, and other places were likewise injured by the loss of the cheap offals of wheat, bran, ship stuff, etc., which came as a by-product of the grinding of Canadian wheat. Mercantile and transportation interests in Chicago and Buffalo, which formerly had handled

Canadian grain, were inconvenienced, and the Canadian railways and the shipping of the St. Lawrence ports gained at the expense of American transportation interests.

The tariff on cattle likewise has created inconvenience not anticipated by the framers of the act. Canada raises little corn. Canadian cattle do not compete with American corn-fed cattle at the packing houses; rather, they constitute raw material for American cattle feeders. The American Farm Bureau Federation, through its Washington representative, Mr. Gray Silver, has recently filed an application with the United States Tariff Commission, asking it to make use of the sliding-scale provision of the tariff act to remove this tariff on cattle as far as possible. Cases have been reported from Montana of unused range on the American side of the line and unfed cattle on the Canadian side prevented from getting together, as the natural course of trade would dictate, by this arbitrary tariff wall.

We shall solve the world's problems only by taking a very comprehensive view of them. The solution is to be found in the restoration of sound money, sound finances, open markets, and a liberal international trade policy, and then in letting private enterprise alone to straighten things out. A radically different course, however, is natural when men take only a partial view of things. Disturbed by unsatisfactory markets due to derangements in world conditions, men in particular industries and in particular countries demand the erection of new barriers to international trade, which may help them temporarily but which still further demoralize the general situation. They ask for Government credits to support particular markets, which help the markets for a time but lead to worse reactions later and meanwhile weaken the Public Treasury. They ask for artificially low interest rates as a means of encouraging speculative buying. They ask for progressive currency depreciation as a means of raising nominal prices. Or they ask for artificial control of markets, which temporarily masks the underlying difficulties but leaves still more riddles to solve in the end. We must take a large view and trust the free play of private enterprise.

Mr. President, I come back to the specific provisions of the bill. It seems to me we would make a great mistake to establish such a precedent.

I scarcely need aver my friendship for the farmers of the country, my sincere desire to see them prosper, my deep concern about their welfare. I would avoid doing them injury while proposing to do them good.

There are difficulties with which they must contend which can not be reached by legislation. There are conditions which they must deal with which can not be remedied by the enactment of a statute. We can not prevent droughts by law. We can not bring rain or sunshine by resolution.

Proposals such as those now pending will tend to bring discredit on any effort of a really helpful nature we may offer hereafter. Supporters of this bill and other similar measures are overreaching, going beyond all reasonable bounds. There is such a thing as taking the pitcher to the well once too often. The result is a broken pitcher. The bucket which comes up full must go down empty. There is no law we can pass to prevent that. The farmer everywhere is a servant of the seasons. You can not change the laws of nature by a statute.

We passed a resolution proposed by the senior Senator from New Mexico last week appropriating $1,000,000 to be loaned drought-stricken farmers directly in New Mexico. The junior Senator from Montana has a resolution of similar purport for the benefit of farmers in Montana.

The bill as reported by the committee carries an appropriation of $75,000,000 to be placed in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase livestock and poultry to furnish farmers at cost and on time at not to exceed 6 per cent interest, the obligation to be secured by a lien on the personal property delivered to them, respectively.

The junior Senator from New Mexico offers an amendment appropriating $20,000,000 to be placed in the hands of the Comptroller of the Currency to be used to restore confidence in failing banks and trust companies. Ninety-five million dollars of the money of all the taxpayers it is proposed we shall appropriate for these particular and special interests.

There will be other amendments offered, and the sky is the limit.

It seems to me we are going wild.

Yet everybody wants to reduce taxes.

It is impossible to reduce taxes and at the same time increase expenditures.

This measure will afford no real national remedy for unsatisfactory, even deplorable, conditions.

It is an attempt to practice philanthropy with other people's money.

This makes no advance toward a solution of the problems involved.

It is an effort to administer expensive stimulation which will be followed by the usual severe headache the morning after.

This is not the way of progress in dealing with the situation.

It will, on the contrary, put the death rattle in the throat of progress.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

"SEC. —. That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate as he may determine to be necessary and find available for increasing agricultural production until June 30, 1926, and to dispose of the same at the total cost to the Government, payable in advance. For carrying out the purposes of this joint resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations and to use such means and agencies of the Government as in his discretion he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate shall go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated and the proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate may be used, at the discretion of the President, until June 30, 1926, as a revolving fund for the purposes herein named."

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow at 3 o'clock we may begin to vote on this bill, together with all amendments thereto, and continue until the bill is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be a quorum before the unanimous-consent proposal can be put to the Senate.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he probably had better make that request in the morning, when we have a full attendance.

Mr. LADD. If we can get a quorum, I should like to make it to-night.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am not disposed myself to delay action on the bill, but I know that there are Senators absent who are opposed to the bill, and I should have to object to the request.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There must be a quorum present before the Senate can act upon the request. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I understood that objection was made to the request. In that case there is not much use in having a roll call.

Mr. McNARY. I entertain the thought that the Senator from Florida will withdraw his objection after the matter is submitted. It is necessary, in the meantime, to have a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum, and insist upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dial	Jones, Wash.	Reed, Pa.
Ball	Dill	Kendrick	Robinson
Brandegee	Fess	Keyes	Sheppard
Brookhart	Fletcher	Ladd	Shields
Broussard	Frazier	Lenroot	Shipstead
Bruce	George	Lodge	Smith
Bursum	Gooding	McNary	Smoot
Cameron	Hale	Moses	Spencer
Capper	Harris	Norris	Stanfield
Caraway	Harrison	Oddie	Stephens
Couzens	Heflin	Overman	Swanson
Cummins	Howell	Pepper	Warren
Curtis	Johnson, Minn.	Phipps	Willis
Dale	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock to-morrow all speeches on this bill be discontinued and that thereafter we begin to vote on the bill and the amendments until the bill is passed, debate being limited to five minutes on any amendment or change in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from North Dakota.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of March 4, 1924, the Senate shall proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war, and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this is a very important bill, and we have had it before us for only a few hours. I, for one, wish to examine the bill, and there are others who desire further to discuss it. I hope the Senator will not at this time press a request for unanimous consent to vote to-morrow. If necessary, I shall object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. WARREN. One moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. LODGE. I withhold the objection.

Mr. WARREN. I very much desire that some agreement may be made so that the Senator who is ably handling the bill now pending may have a time fixed when a vote may be taken on the bill without there being a temptation on my part, in charge of appropriation bills, to interrupt or interfere with the consideration of the Senator's bill, and that we may proceed in due course to transact some business.

A year ago, 10 or 12 days earlier than this time, we had passed all the appropriation bills for the forthcoming year, while this year we have passed not one. Last year we had a session lasting only three months it is true, but the entire month of November, 1922, was consumed in the consideration of appropriation bills in the committee, so that in four months of good, hard work we were able to encompass the passage of all the appropriation bills.

At that time, however, we had behind us the universal desire for a vacation, for which we had long been waiting. If we take the same time this year that we took at the last session, having March, April, May, and June, it would take us up to July. Some progress has been made on the House side and here in the subcommittees, but I submit that some arrangement must be made for the appropriation bills to be taken up and passed upon in the Senate. If not, we may look for a continuation of the session through the summer. If the Senator from North Dakota can fix a later date which would be satisfactory, or propose anything on which we can get an agreement, I should be glad to join.

Mr. LODGE. I say to the Senator from North Dakota, it seems very short notice, after having the bill up to-day and one or two speeches on it, to ask us to vote on it to-morrow. There are many Senators who hardly realize that the bill is pending. I shall be very glad, as far as I am concerned, to agree on some later date when the Senate can take a vote.

Mr. LADD. I am entirely willing to agree to a later date. I was only attempting to accommodate the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to hurry it along and get a vote on it as soon as possible.

Mr. LODGE. I agree with the Senator from Wyoming, of course, that it is of great importance to get the appropriation bills passed, and I want to take all the obstacles out of the way I can. I do not ask for any long delay in getting a vote on the pending bill.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if he will not couple with his unanimous consent request a provision that when the debate is closed a certain time be given, say five minutes, for the presentation of further amendments?

Mr. LADD. I intended to have that inserted in my request.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood the Senator to say that, but it was not read from the desk.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understood the Senator from North Dakota, he included in his request a five minutes provision. In order to expedite matters, I ask unanimous consent that after 3 o'clock to-morrow all speeches upon the bill or any amendment to the bill be limited to 10 minutes. That will bring us to a head in a reasonable length of time and give opportunity for intelligent debate. I am making no suggestion as to the time for a final vote, but to limit the speeches and let them run on for a little while, and then we can agree and wind up the debate.

Mr. LODGE. I will very readily agree to that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. To save time, Mr. President, permit me to say that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] spoke to me just a few moments ago, stating that he had to go to a hearing, and he asked me to object to any unanimous-consent agreement made with reference to this bill to-day, and, pursuant to that request, I shall have to object.

Mr. NORRIS. Then we might just as well not try to get an agreement to-day. Let it go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to say that while it is true, as stated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], that little progress has been made toward the passage of the appropriation bills, as far as I know, there is no appropriation bill in the Senate, except the Treasury Department bill, and that was brought in only a day or two ago.

Mr. WARREN. The Treasury bill referred to includes also the Post Office Department appropriations, and was reported to the Senate one full week ago.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no disposition on the part of anyone, so far as I know, to delay action on appropriation bills, and I suggest to the Senator that as fast as he gets them ready he bring them forward, and give the Senate a chance to pass them.

Mr. LODGE. The Treasury Department bill covers also the Post Office Department appropriations.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is very true.

Mr. WARREN. I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas that what I have said is not in a fault-finding mood at all, because the House has had its delays, too; but it is purely in the line of getting some of this business up to date.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that; but I thought it well enough to review the fact that there has been no delinquency on the part of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to say just a word with regard to the bill in charge of the Senator from North Dakota. Although it is a minor bill, it is one of the bills coming from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but it does not reach the general agricultural situation. It was reported, first, because the committee felt it met an acute situation in a certain part of the country. That bill, together with the bill reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], which is a general agricultural bill in its scope, ought to be considered and disposed of in some way without delay. In my judgment, they should not be laid aside for any appropriation bill. They are just as important as any of the appropriation bills. I myself do not want to delay the appropriation bills, but it will be all right if the appropriation bills are enacted into law by the 1st day of July. However, it will not be all right for this bill to go over until that time. If we are going to have these bills passed at all, we ought to have them passed at once.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it will save us time to-morrow on both bills if we take a recess, and I ask that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Just a moment, pending that request. That would give us, then, in the morning three hours, from 12 o'clock until 3 for general discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON. No attempt is being made to limit debate or to fix a time to vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. What was the request?

Mr. LODGE. To take a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No unanimous-consent agreement has been entered into.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, unless some arrangement is made by which we can have from 12 o'clock until 3—because the morning business will if taken up consume two hours, and it will be 2 o'clock before we can discuss anything except bills that may come up between 12 and 2 o'clock——

Mr. LODGE. The recess will cut off the morning hour. That is why I have asked for it.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is exactly why I inquired if we would then have from 12 o'clock until 3 for general discussion.

Mr. LODGE. It was for that reason that I asked for a recess.

Mr. ROBINSON. The hour of 3 o'clock has no relation to the pending proposal. The proposal is that when the Senate concludes its business to-day we shall recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. There is no idea at present of limiting debate or fixing the time for a vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. I understood that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] made such a request, that we begin voting on amendments at 3 o'clock, and I did not know that it had been objected to.

Mr. ROBINSON. That has been objected to.

Mr. LODGE. That was objected to, and it went over.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to taking a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is ordered that when the Senate concludes its business for to-day it shall take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

INVESTIGATION OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. JONES of Washington (for Mr. BROOKHART) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 183), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution No. 157, agreed to February 29, 1924, be, and the same hereby is, amended to include authorization for the employment of such clerical and other personal services as may be necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of said resolution.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES AND INSULAR POSSESSIONS.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask unanimous consent to call up Senate Resolution 162, authorizing the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions to hold hearings and employ a stenographer. I have conferred with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] about the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the request ought to be granted for the reason that the committee for several days has been holding hearings, but it has no authority to employ a stenographer or to compensate him.

The resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-eighth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 4, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

RIGHTS IN THE CAMEROONS.

In executive session this day, the following treaty was ratified and, on motion of Mr. LODGE, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, a treaty between the United States and France, signed at Paris on February 13, 1923, in regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in that part of the former German colony of the Cameroons over which a mandate was conferred upon France.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

Accompaniment: Treaty, as above.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 12, 1923.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty between the United States and France, signed at Paris on February 13, 1923, in regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in that part of the former German colony of the Cameroons over which a mandate was conferred upon France.

Respectfully submitted. CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Accompaniment: Treaty, as above.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 11, 1923.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND FRANCE RELATING TO THE PART OF THE CAMEROONS UNDER FRENCH MANDATE.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic.

Whereas by article 119 of the treaty of peace signed at Versailles the 28th of June, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her oversea possessions; and

Whereas by article 22 of the same instrument it was provided that certain territories which, as a result of the war, had ceased to be under the sovereignty of the states which formerly governed them, should be placed under the mandate of another power, and that the terms of the mandate should be explicitly defined in each case by the Council of the League of Nations; and

Whereas the benefits accruing under the aforesaid article 119 of the treaty of Versailles were confirmed to the United States by the treaty between the United States and Germany, signed August 25, 1921, to restore friendly relations between the two nations; and

Whereas four of the principal allied and associated powers, to wit, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreed that France should exercise the mandate for part of the former German colony of the Cameroons; and

Whereas the terms of the said mandate have been defined by the Council of the League of Nations as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The territory for which a mandate is conferred upon France comprises that part of the Cameroons which lies to the east of the line laid down in the declaration signed on July 10, 1919, of which copy is annexed hereto.

This line may, however, be slightly modified by mutual agreement between His Britannic Majesty's Government and the Government of the French Republic where an examination of the localities shows that it is undesirable, either in the interest of the inhabitants or by reason of any inaccuracies in the map Moisel 1/300,000, annexed to the declaration, to adhere strictly to the line laid down therein.

The delimitation on the spot of this line shall be carried out in accordance with the provisions of the said declaration.

The final report of the mixed commission shall give the exact description of the boundary line as traced on the spot; maps signed by the commissioners shall be annexed to the report. This report with its annexes shall be drawn up in triplicate; one of these shall be deposited in the archives of the League of Nations, one shall be kept by the Government of the Republic, and one by His Britannic Majesty's Government.

ART. 2. The mandatory shall be responsible for the peace, order, and good government of the territory and for the promotion to the utmost of the material and moral well-being and the social progress of its inhabitants.

ART. 3. The mandatory shall not establish in the territory any military or naval bases, nor erect any fortifications, nor organize any native military force except for local police purposes and for the defense of the territory.

It is understood, however, that the troops thus raised may, in the event of general war, be utilized to repel an attack or for defense of the territory outside that subject to the mandate.

ART. 4. The mandatory:

1° Shall provide for the eventual emancipation of all slaves and for as speedy an elimination of domestic and other slavery as social conditions will allow;

2° Shall suppress all forms of slave trade;

3° Shall prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor, except for essential public works and services, and then only in return for adequate remuneration;

4° Shall protect the natives from measures of fraud and force by the careful supervision of labor contracts and the recruiting of labor;

5° Shall exercise a strict control over the traffic in arms and ammunition and the sale of spirituous liquors.

ART. 5. In the framing of laws relating to the holding or transference of land the mandatory shall take into consideration native laws and customs and shall respect the rights and safeguard the interests of the native population.

No native land may be transferred, except between natives, without the previous consent of the public authorities, and no real rights over native land in favor of nonnatives may be created except with the same consent.

The mandatory shall promulgate strict regulations against usury.

ART. 6. The mandatory shall secure to all nationals of states members of the League of Nations the same rights as are enjoyed in the territory by his own nationals in respect of entry into and residence in the territory, the protection afforded to their person and property, movable and immovable, and the exercise of their profession or trade, subject only to the requirements of public order, and on condition of compliance with the local law.

Further, the mandatory shall insure to all nationals of states members of the League of Nations, on the same footing as his own nationals, freedom of transit and navigation, and complete economic, commercial, and industrial equality; provided that the mandatory shall be free to organize essential public works and services on such terms and conditions as he thinks just.

Concessions for the development of the natural resources of the territory shall be granted by the mandatory without distinction on grounds of nationality between the nationals of all states members of the League of Nations, but on such conditions as will maintain intact the authority of the local Government.

Concessions having the character of a general monopoly shall not be granted. This provision does not affect the right of the mandatory to create monopolies of a purely fiscal character in the interest of the territory under mandate and in order to provide the territory with fiscal resources which seem best suited to the local requirements; or, in certain cases, to carry out the development of natural resources, either directly by the state or by a conrolled agency, provided that there shall result therefrom no monopoly of the natural resources for the benefit of the mandatory or his nationals, directly or indirectly, nor any preferential advantage which shall be inconsistent with the economic, commercial, and industrial equality hereinbefore guaranteed.

The rights conferred by this article extend equally to companies and associations organized in accordance with the law of any of the members of the League of Nations, subject only to the requirements of public order, and on condition of compliance with the local law.

ART. 7. The mandatory shall insure in the territory complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; missionaries who are nationals of states members of the League of Nations shall be free to enter the territory and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the territory; it being understood, however, that the mandatory shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government, and to take all measures required for such control.

ART. 8. The mandatory shall apply to the territory any general international conventions applicable to his contiguous territory.

ART. 9. The mandatory shall have full powers of administration and legislation in the area subject of the mandate. This area shall be administered in accordance with the laws of the mandatory as an integral part of his territory and subject to the above provisions.

The mandatory shall therefore be at liberty to apply his laws to the territory subject to the mandate with such modifications as may be required by local conditions, and to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal, or administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories under his sovereignty or control; provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate.

ART. 10. The mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council. This report shall contain full information concerning the measures taken to apply the provisions of this mandate.

ART. 11. The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of the present mandate.

ART. 12. The mandatory agrees that, if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Whereas the United States of America, by participating in the war against Germany, contributed to her defeat and to the renunciation of her rights and titles over her oversea possessions, but has not ratified the treaty of Versailles; and

Whereas the Government of the United States and the Government of the French Republic desire to reach a definite understanding with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the aforesaid former German colony of the Cameroons:

Have decided to conclude a convention to this effect, and have nominated as their respective plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

The President of the United States of America:

His Excellency, Mr. Myron T. Herrick, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Paris;

And the President of the French Republic:

M. Raymond Poincaré, senator, president of the council, Minister of Foreign Affairs;

Who, after communicating to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following provisions:

ARTICLE 1.

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by the Government of the French Republic, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate of the former German territory described in article 1 of the mandate.

ARTICLE 2.

The United States and its nationals shall have and enjoy all the rights and benefits secured under the terms of articles 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the mandate to members of the League of Nations and their nationals, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 3.

Vested American property rights in the mandated territory shall be respected and in no way impaired.

ARTICLE 4.

A duplicate of the annual report to be made by the mandatory under Article 10 of the mandate shall be furnished to the United States.

ARTICLE 5.

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited above unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States.

ARTICLE 6.

The extradition treaties and conventions in force between the United States and France shall apply to the mandated territory.

ARTICLE 7.

The present convention shall be ratified in accordance with the respective constitutional methods of the high contracting parties. The ratifications shall be exchanged in Paris as soon as practicable. It shall take effect on the date of the exchange of ratifications.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Paris, the 13th day of February, in the year 1923.

(Signed) MYRON T. HERRICK.
R. POINCARÉ.

APPENDIX.

REFERRED TO IN ARTICLE 1 OF THE FRENCH MANDATE FOR THE CAMEROONS.

FRANCO-BRITISH DECLARATION.

The undersigned:

The Viscount Milner, Secretary of State for the Colonies of the British Empire,

M. Henry Simon, Minister for the Colonies of the French Republic, have agreed to determine the frontier separating the territories of the Cameroons placed, respectively, under the authority of their Governments, as it is traced on the map Moisel 1/300,000, annexed to the present declaration (the original 1/300,000 map is attached to the signed declaration) and defined in the description in three articles also annexed hereto.

London, July 10th, 1919.

Signé: MILNER.
HENRY SIMON.

Description of the Franco-British Frontier.

MARKED ON THE MOISEL'S MAP OF THE CAMEROONS, SCALE 1/300,000.

ARTICLE I.

The frontier will start from the meeting point of the three old British, French, and German frontiers situated in Lake Chad in latitude 13° 05′ N. and in approximately longitude 14° 05′ E. of Greenwich.

Thence the frontier will be determined as follows:

1. A straight line to the mouth of the Ebeji;

2. Thence the course of the River Ebeji, which upstream is named the Lewejil, Labejed, Ngalarem, Lebeit, and Ngada, respectively, to the confluence of the Rivers Kalia and Lebalit;

3. Thence the course of the River Kalia, or Ame, to its confluence with the River Dorma, or Kutelaha;

4. Thence the course of the latter, which upstream is named the Amjumba, the village of Woma and its outskirts remaining to France;

5. From the point where the River Amjumba loses itself in a swamp, the boundary will follow the median line of this swamp so as to rejoin the watercourse which appears to be the continuation of the Amjumba and which upstream is named Serahadja, Goluwa, and Mudukwa, respectively, the village of Uagisa remaining to Great Britain;

6. Thence this watercourse to its confluence with the River Gatagule;

7. Thence a line southwestwards to the watershed between the basin of the Yedseram on the west and the basins of the Mudukwa and of the Benue on the east; thence this watershed to Mount Mulikia;

8. Thence a line to the source of the Tsikakiri, to be fixed on the ground so as to leave the village of Dumo to France;

9. Thence the course of the Tsikakiri to its confluence with the Mao Tiel near the group of villages of Luga;

10. Thence the course of the Mao Tiel to its confluence with the River Benue;

11. Thence the course of the Benue upstream to its confluence with the Faro;

12. Thence the course of the Faro to the mouth of its arm, the Mao Hesso, situated about 4 kilometers south of Chikito;

13. Thence the course of the Mao Hesso to boundary pillar No. 6 on the old British-German frontier;

14. Thence a straight line to the old boundary pillar No. 7; and thence a straight line to the old boundary pillar No. 8;

15. Thence a line southwestwards reaching the watershed between the Benue on the northwest and the Faro on the southeast, which it follows to a point on the Hossere Banglang, about 1 kilometer south of the source of the Mao Kordo;

16. Thence a line to the confluence of the Mao Ngonga and the Mao Deo, to be fixed on the ground so as to leave to France the village of Laro, as well as the road from Bare to Fort Lamy;

17. Thence the course of the Mao Deo to its confluence with the Tiba;

18. Thence the course of the Tiba, which is named upstream Tisbat and Tussa, respectively, to its confluence with a watercourse flowing from the west and situated about 12 kilom. southwest of Kontscha;

19. Thence a line running generally southwest to reach the summit of the Dutschi-Djombi;

20. Thence the watershed between the basins of the Taraba on the west and the Mao Deo on the east to a point on the Tchape Hills, about 2 kilom. northwest of the Tchape Pass (Point 1541);

21. Thence a line to the Gorulde Hills, so as to leave the road from Bare to Fort Lamy about 2 kilom. to the east;

22. Thence, successively, the watershed between the Gamgam and the Jim, the main watershed between the basins of the Benue and the Sanaga, and the watershed between the Kokumbahun and the Ardo (Ntull) to Hossere Jadji;

23. Thence a line to reach the source of the river Mafu;

24. Thence the river Mafu to its confluence with the river Mabe;

25. Thence the river Mabe, or Nsang, upstream to its junction with the tribal boundary between Bansso and Bamum;

26. Thence a line to the confluence of the rivers Mpand and Nun, to be fixed on the ground, so as to leave the country of Bansso to Great Britain and that of Bamum to France;

27. Thence the river Nun to its confluence with the river Tantam;

28. Thence the river Tantam and its affluent, which is fed by the river Sefu;

29. Thence the river Sefu to its source;

30. Thence a line southwestwards, crossing the Kupti, to reach near its source east of Point 1300 the unnamed watercourse which flows into the Northern Mifi below Bali-Bagam;

31. Thence this watercourse to its confluence with the Northern Mifi, leaving to France the village of Gascho, belonging to the small country of Bamenjam;

32. Thence the Northern Mifi upstream to its confluence with the River Mogo, or Doschi;

33. Thence the River Mogo to its source;

34. Thence a line southwestward to the crest of the Bambuto Mountains and thence following the watershed between the basins of the Cross River and Mungo on the west and the Sanaga and Wuri on the east to Mount Kupe;

35. Thence a line to the source of the River Bubu;

36. Thence the river Bubu, which appears from the German map to lose itself and reappear as the Edminjo, which the frontier will follow, to its confluence with the Mungo;

37. Thence the course of the Mungo to the point in its mouth where it meets the parallel of latitude 4° 2′ 30″ north;

38. Thence this parallel of latitude westward so as to reach the coast south of Tauben I.;

39. Thence a line following the coast, passing south of Reiher I., to Mokola Creek, thus leaving Mowe Lake to Great Britain;

40. Thence a line following the eastern banks of the Mokola, Mbakwele, Njubanan-Jau and Matumal Creeks, and cutting the mouths of the Mbossa-Bombe, Mikanje, Tende, Victoria, and other unnamed creeks to the junction of the Matumal and Victoria Creeks;

41. Thence a line running 35° west of true south to the Atlantic Ocean.

ARTICLE 2.

1° It is understood that at the time of the local delimitation of the frontier, where the natural features to be followed are not indicated in the above description, the commissioners of the two Governments will, as far as possible, but without changing the attribution of the villages named in article 1, lay down the frontier in accordance with natural features (rivers, hills, or watersheds).

The boundary commissioners shall be authorized to make such minor modifications of the frontier line as may appear to them necessary in order to avoid separating villages from their agricultural lands. Such deviations shall be clearly marked on special maps and submitted for the approval of the two Governments. Pending such approval, the deviations shall be provisionally recognized and respected.

2° As regards the roads mentioned in article 1, only those which are shown upon the annexed map (annexed only to the original declaration) shall be taken into consideration in the delimitation of the frontier.

3° Where the frontier follows a waterway, the median line of the waterway shall be the boundary.

4° It is understood that if the inhabitants living near the frontier should, within a period of six months from the completion of the local delimitation, express the intention to settle in the regions placed under French authority, or, inversely, in the regions placed under British authority, no obstacle will be placed in the way of their so doing, and they shall be granted the necessary time to gather in standing crops, and generally to remove all the property of which they are the legitimate owners.

ARTICLE 3.

1° The map to which reference is made in the description of the frontier is Moisel's map of the Cameroons on the scale 1/300,000.

The following sheets of this map have been used:
Sheet A4. Tschad: dated December 1st, 1912;
Sheet B4. Kusseri: dated August 1st, 1912;
Sheet B3. Dikoa: dated January 1st, 1913;
Sheet C3. Mubi: dated December 15th, 1912;
Sheet D3. Garua: dated May 15th, 1912;
Sheet E3. Ngaundere: dated October 15th, 1912;
Sheet E2. Banjo: dated January 1st, 1913;
Sheet F2. Fumban: dated May 1st, 1913;
Sheet F1. Ossidinge: dated January 1st, 1912;
Sheet G1. Buea: dated August 1st, 1911.

2° A map of the Cameroons, scale 1/2,000,000, is attached to illustrate the description of the above frontier.

RIGHTS IN TOGOLAND.

In executive session this day, the following treaty was ratified and, on motion of Mr. LODGE, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, a treaty between the United States and France, signed at Paris on February 13, 1923, in regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in that part of the former German colony of Togoland over which a mandate was conferred upon France.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

Accompaniment: Treaty, as above.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 12, 1923.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty between the United States and France, signed at Paris on February 13, 1923, in regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in that part of the former German colony of Togoland over which a mandate was conferred upon France.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Accompaniment: Treaty, as above.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 11, 1923.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND FRANCE RELATING TO THE PART OF TOGOLAND UNDER FRENCH MANDATE.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic.

Whereas by article 119 of the treaty of peace signed at Versailles the 28th of June, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her oversea possessions; and

Whereas by article 22 of the same instrument it was provided that certain territories which, as a result of the war, had ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them, should be placed under the mandate of another power, and that the terms of the mandate should be explicitly defined in each case by the council of the League of Nations; and

Whereas the benefits accruing under the aforesaid article 119 of the treaty of Versailles were confirmed to the United States by the treaty between the United States and Germany, signed August 25, 1921, to restore friendly relations between the two nations; and

Whereas four of the principal allied and associated powers, to wit, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreed that France should exercise the mandate for part of the former German colony of Togoland; and

Whereas the terms of the said mandate have been defined by the Council of the League of Nations as follows:

ARTICLE 1. The territory over which a mandate is conferred upon France comprises that part of Togoland which lies to the east of the line laid down in the declaration signed on July 10, 1919, of which a copy is annexed hereto.

This line may, however, be slightly modified by mutual agreement between His Britannic Majesty's Government and the Government of the French Republic where an examination of the localities shows that it is undesirable, either in the interests of the inhabitants or by reason of any inaccuracies in the map, Sprigade 1:200,000, annexed to the declaration, to adhere strictly to the line laid down therein.

The delimitation on the spot of this line shall be carried out in accordance with the provision of the said declaration.

The final report of the mixed commission shall give the exact description of the boundary line as traced on the spot; maps signed by the commissioners shall be annexed to the report. This report, with its annexes, shall be drawn up in triplicate; one of these shall be deposited in the archives of the League of Nations, one shall be kept by the Government of the Republic, and one by his His Britannic Majesty's Government.

ART. 2. The mandatory shall be responsible for the peace, order, and good government of the territory and for the promotion to the utmost of the material and moral well-being and the social progress of its inhabitants.

ART. 3. The mandatory shall not establish in the territory any military or naval bases, nor erect any fortifications, nor organize any native military force, except for local police purposes and for the defense of the territory.

It is understood, however, that the troops thus raised may in the event of a general war be utilized to repel an attack or for the defense of the territory outside that subject to the mandate.

ART. 4. The mandatory—

1. Shall provide for the eventual emancipation of all slaves and for as speedy an elimination of domestic and other slavery as social condition will allow.

2. Shall suppress all forms of slave trade.

3. Shall prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor, except for essential public works and services, and then only in return for adequate remuneration.

4. Shall protect the natives from measures of fraud and force by the careful supervision of labor contracts and the recruiting of labor.

5. Shall exercise a strict control over the traffic in arms and ammunition and the sale of spirituous liquors.

ART. 5. In the framing of laws relating to the holding or transfer of land the mandatory shall take into consideration native laws and customs and shall respect the rights and safeguard the interests of the native population.

No native land may be transferred, except between natives, without the previous consent of the public authorities, and no real rights over native land in favor of nonnatives may be created, except with the same consent.

The mandatory shall promulgate strict regulations against usury.

ART. 6. The mandatory shall secure to all nationals of states members of the League of Nations the same rights as are enjoyed in the territory by his own nationals in respect of entry into and residence in the territory, the protection afforded to their person and property and acquisition of property, movable and immovable, and the exercise of their profession or trade, subject only to the requirements of public order and on condition of compliance with the local law.

Further, the mandatory shall insure to all nationals of states members of the League of Nations, on the same footing as to his own nationals, freedom of transit and navigation and complete economic, commercial, and industrial equality, except that mandatory shall be free to organize essential public works and services on such terms and conditions as he thinks just.

Concessions for the development of the natural resources of the territory shall be granted by the mandatory without distinction on grounds of nationality between the nationals of all states members of the League of Nations, but on such conditions as will maintain intact the authority of the local government.

Concessions having the character of a general monopoly shall not be granted. This provision does not affect the right of the mandatory to create monopolies of a purely fiscal character in the interest of the territory under mandate and in order to provide the territory with fiscal resources which seem best suited to the local requirements; or, in certain cases, to carry out the development of natural resources, either directly by the state or by a controlled agency, provided that there shall result therefrom no monopoly of the natural resources for the benefit of the mandatory or his nationals, directly or indirectly, nor any preferential advantage which shall be inconsistent with the economic, commercial, and industrial equality hereinbefore guaranteed.

The rights conferred by this article extend equally to companies and associations organized in accordance with the law of any of the members of the League of Nations, subject only to the requirements of public order, and on condition of compliance with the local law.

ART. 7. The mandatory shall insure in the territory complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; missionaries who are nationals of state members of the League of Nations shall be free to enter the territory and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the territory; it being understood, however, that the mandatory shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government, and to take all measures required for such control.

ART. 8. The mandatory shall apply to the territory any general international conventions applicable to his contiguous territory.

ART. 9. The mandatory shall have full powers of administration and legislation in the area subject to the mandate. This area shall be administered in accordance with the laws of the mandatory as an integral part of his territory and subject to the above provisions.

The mandatory shall therefore be at liberty to apply his laws to the territory subject to the mandate, with such modifications as may be required by local conditions, and to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal, or administrative union or federation with the adjacent territories under his sovereignty or control, provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate.

ART. 10. The mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council. This report shall contain full information concerning the measures taken to apply the provisions of this mandate.

ART. 11. The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of the present mandate.

ART. 12. The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation or the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Whereas the United States of America by participating in the war against Germany contributed to her defeat and to the renunciation of her rights and titles over her oversea possessions, but has not ratified the treaty of Versailles; and

Whereas the Government of the United States and the Government of the French Republic desire to reach a definite understanding with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the aforesaid former German colony of Togoland:

Have decided to conclude a convention to this effect, and have nominated as their respective plenipotentiaries; that is to say—

The President of the United States of America;

His Excellency Mr. Myron T. Herrick, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Paris;

And the President of the French Republic;

M. Raymond Poincaré, senator, president of the council, Minister of Foreign Affairs;

Who, after communicating to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following provisions:

ARTICLE 1.

Subject to the provisions of the present convention, the United States consents to the administration by the Government of the French Republic, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of the former German territory, described in article 1 of the mandate.

ARTICLE 2.

The United States and its nationals shall have and enjoy all the rights and benefits secured under the terms of articles 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 of the mandate to members of the League of Nations and their nationals, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 3.

Vested American property rights in the mandated territory shall be respected and in no way impaired.

ARTICLE 4.

A duplicate of the annual report to be made by the mandatory under article 10 of the mandate shall be furnished to the United States.

ARTICLE 5.

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited above unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States.

ARTICLE 6.

The extradition treaties and conventions in force between the United States and France shall apply to the mandated territory.

ARTICLE 7.

The present convention shall be ratified in accordance with the respective constitutional methods of the high contracting parties. The ratifications shall be exchanged in Paris as soon as practicable. It shall take effect on the date of the exchange of ratifications.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Paris, the 13th day of February, in the year 1923.

R. POINCARÉ.

APPENDIX.

REFERRED TO IN ARTICLE 1 OF THE FRENCH MANDATE FOR TOGOLAND.

FRANCO-BRITISH DECLARATION.

The undersigned:

Viscount Milner, Secretary of State for the colonies of the British Empire,

M. Henry Simon, minister for the colonies of the French Republic, have agreed to determine the frontier separating the territories of Togoland placed respectively under the authority of their Governments, as it is traced on the map, Sprigade 1/200,000, annexed to the present declaration (the original 1/200,000 map is attached to the signed declaration), and defined in the description in three articles also annexed hereto.

Description of the Franco-British Frontier.

MARKED ON SPRIGADE'S MAP OF TOGOLAND, SCALE 1/200,000.

ARTICLE 1.

The frontier will run eastward from the pillar erected at the point of junction of the three colonies of Haute Volta, Gold Coast and Togoland in about latitude 11° 8′ 33″ to the unnamed watercourse shown on the map to the east of this pillar.

The frontier will run thence as follows:

1. Along this unnamed watercourse to its confluence with the Kulapalogo;

2. Thence by the course of the Punokobo to its source;

3. Thence in a southwesterly direction to meet the river Blankuri, which downstream is named the Njimoant and the Mochole, which it follows to its confluence with the Kulugona;

4. From the confluence of the Mochole and the Kulugona the frontier will follow in a southerly direction a line to be fixed on the ground to point 390 near the junction of the streams Nabuleg and Gboroch;

5. Thence a line running in a southeasterly direction to the Manjo, so as to leave the village of Jambule to France and that of Bungpurk to Great Britain;

6. Thence downstream the course of the Manjo to its confluence with the Kunkumbu;

7. Thence the course of the Kunkumbu to its confluence with the Oti;

8. Thence the course of the Oti to its confluence with the Dakpe;

9. Thence the Dakpe upstream to the boundary between the two old German districts of Mangu-Yendi and Sokode-Bassari;

10. The frontier will follow this administrative boundary southwest to regain the Oti;

11. Thence the course of the Oti to its confluence with the Kakassi;

12. Thence the course of the Kakassi upstream to its confluence with the Kentau;

13. Thence the course of the Kentau to its junction with the tribal boundary between the Konkomba and the Bitjem;

14. Thence southwards a line following generally this tribal boundary so as to leave the villages of Natagu, Napari, and Bobotiwe to Great Britain and those of Kujunle and Bisukpabe to France;

15. Following this boundary to a point situated about 1½ kilometers north of the confluence of the Kula and the Mamale;

16. Thence the Mamale upstream to its junction with the road from Nabugem to Bpadjebe;

17. Thence a line southwards to meet the river Bonolo, so as to leave Bpadjebe to France;

18. Thence downstream the rivers Bonolo and Tankpa to the confluence of the latter with the Nabol;

19. Thence the river Nabol upstream to the junction of the tribal boundary between the Konkomba and the Bitjem;

20. Thence southwards a line following generally this tribal boundary to the summit of Kusangnaeli;

21. Thence a line to reach the confluence of the Tunkurna and the Mo, following generally the course of the Kuji and Tunkurma;

22. Thence the course of the Mo (Mola) downstream, following the southern boundary of the Dagbon country to its junction with an unnamed affluent on the left bank at a point shown on the map near longitude 0° 20′ east;

23. Thence a line from this confluence running generally southeast to the confluence of the Bassa and Kue, following as far as possible the course of the Mo (Moo);

24. Thence the course of the Kue upstream to the bend formed by this river at a distance of about 2 kilometers southwest of Kueda;

25. Thence a line running southwards following the watershed between the Bunatje, the Tschai, and the Dibom on the west and the Kue and the Asuokoko on the east to the hill situated about 1 kilometer west of the Maria Falls, leaving the village of Schiare to Great Britain and that of Kjirina to France and cutting the road from Dadiasse (which remains British) to Bismarckburg (which remains French) near point 760;

26. From the hill situated to the west of the Maria Falls a line to reach the Asuokoko, which it follows to is confluence with the river Balagbo;

27. Thence a line running generally southwards to Mount Bendjabe;

28. Thence a line following the crest which runs southwards, then, cutting the Wawa, reaches point 850 situated north of Kitschibo;

29. From point 850 a line running approximately southwards to the Tomito Mountain;

30. Thence a line running south-southwestwards and, cutting the River Onana, reaches the watershed between the Odjabi and the Sassa, then continuing south-southwestwards, cutting the River Daji between the Odjabi and the Sassa, reaches the summit of Awedjegbe;

31. From this point it follows the watershed between the Ebanda or Wadjakli on the west and the Seblawu and Nubui on the east, then cuts the latter river at a point situated about 1 kilometer east of Apegame;

32. Thence a line to the watershed of the Agumassato Hills, which it follows to the Akpata Hills;

33. Thence a line running southwest to the confluence of the Tsi and the Edjiri;

34. Thence a line following generally the southern tribal boundary of the Agome to a point situated on the watershed about 2 kilometers south of Moltke Peak;

35. Thence a line running generally southward, following the watershed to the Fiamekito Hills, which it leaves to reach the River Damitsi;

36. Thence the River Damitsi to its confluence with the Todschie (or Wuto);

37. Thence the River Todschie to the boundary of the lands of the village of Botoe, which it apposes on the east so as to leave it wholly to Great Britain;

38. Thence the road from Botoe to Batome to the western limit of the latter village;

39. Thence the line passes south of Batome so as to leave this village in its entirety to France;

40. From south of Batome the boundary runs to the point of junction of the present boundary of the Gold Coast Colony (parallel 6° 20′ north) and the River Magbawi;

41. Thence it follows to the sea the present frontier as laid down in the Anglo-German convention of July 1st, 1890. However, where the Lome-Akepe Road by way of Degbokovhe, crosses the present frontier south of latitude 6° 10′ north and west of longitude 1° 14′ east of Greenwich, the new frontier shall run 1 kilometer southwest of this road, so as to leave it entirely in French territory.

ARTICLE 2.

1° It is understood that at the time of the local delimitation of the frontier, where the natural features to be followed are not indicated in the above description, the commissioners of the two Governments will, as far as possible but without changing the attribution of the villages named in article 1, lay down the frontier in accordance with natural features (rivers, hills, or watersheds).

The boundary commissioners shall be authorized to make such minor modifications of the frontier line as may appear to them necessary in order to avoid separating villages from their agricultural lands. Such deviations shall be clearly marked on special maps and submitted for the approval of the two Governments. Pending such approval, the deviations shall be provisionally recognized and respected.

2° As regards the roads mentioned in article 1, only those which are shown upon annexed map (amended only to the original declaration) shall be taken into consideration in the delimitation of the frontier.

3° Where the frontier follows a waterway the median line of the waterway shall be the boundary.

4° It is understood that if the inhabitants living near the frontier should within a period of six months from the completion of the local delimitation express the intention to settle in the regions placed under French authority, or, inversely, in the regions placed under British authority, no obstacle will be placed in the way of their so doing, and they shall be granted the necessary time to gather in standing crops and generally to remove all the property of which they are the legitimate owners.

ARTICLE 3.

1° The map to which reference is made in the description of the frontier is Sprigade's map of Togoland on the scale 1/200,000, of which the following sheets have been used:

Sheet A 1. Sansane-Mangu: Date of completion, July 1st, 1907;

Sheet B 1. Jendi: Date of completion, October 1st, 1907;

Sheet C 1. Bismarckburg: Date of completion, December 1st, 1906;

Sheet D 1. Kete-Kratschi: Date of completion, December 1st, 1905;

Sheet E 1. Misahöhe: Date of completion, June 1st, 1905;

Sheet E 2. Lome: Date of completion, October 1st, 1902.

2° A map of Togoland, scale 1/500,000, is attached to illustrate the description of the above frontier.

RIGHTS IN EAST AFRICA.

In executive session this day, the following treaty was ratified, and on motion of Mr. LODGE the injunction or secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, a treaty between the United States and Belgium, signed at Brussels on April 18, 1923, in regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in that part of the former German colony of East Africa over which a mandate was conferred upon Belgium, and an amendatory proctocol signed at Brussels on January 21, 1924.

The attention of the Senate is invited to the statement in the accompanying report of the Secretary of State regarding the pagination of the treaty.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 18, 1924.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to their transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty between the United States and Belgium, signed at Brussels on April 18, 1923, in regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in that part of the former colony of German East Africa over which a mandate was conferred upon Belgium, and an amendatory protocol, signed between the two Governments at Brussels on January 21, 1924.

The Secretary of State regrets that the pages of the treaty as it was signed, sealed, and bound at Brussels are not in their regular order. The pages have, however, been numbered in the State Department to show their proper sequence.

Respectfully submitted.

TREATY WITH BELGIUM CONCERNING HER MANDATE OVER THE TERRITORY OF RUANDA-URUNDI.

Whereas by article 119 of the treaty of peace signed at Versailles the 28th of June, 1919, Germany renounced in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her oversea possessions; and

Whereas by article 22 of the same instrument it was provided that certain territories, which as a result of the war had ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them, should be placed under the mandate of another power, and that the terms of the mandate should be explicitly defined in each case by the Council of the League of Nations; and

Whereas the benefits accruing to the United States under the aforesaid article 119 of the treaty of Versailles were confirmed by the treaty between the United States and Germany, signed on August 25, 1921, to restore friendly relations between the two nations; and

Whereas four of the principal allied and associated powers, to wit, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, agreed that the King of the Belgians should exercise the mandate for part of the former colony of German East Africa; and

Whereas the terms of the said mandate have been defined by the Council of the League of Nations as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The territory over which a mandate is conferred upon His Majesty the King of the Belgians (hereinafter called the mandatory) comprises that part of the territory of the former colony of German East Africa situated to the west of the following line:

From the point where the frontier between the Uganda protectorate and German East Africa cuts the river Mavumba, a straight line in a southeasterly direction to point 1840, about 15 kilometers south-southwest of Mount Gabiro;

Thence a straight line in a southerly direction to the north shore of Lake Mohazi where it terminates at the confluence of a river situated about 2½ kilometers west of the confluence of the River Mallala;

If the trace of the railway on the west of the River Kagera between Buguli and Uganda approaches with 16 kilometers of the line defined above, the boundary will be carried to the west, following a minimum distance of 16 kilometers from the trace, without, however, passing to the west of the straight line joining the terminal point on Lake Mohazi and the top of Mount Kivisa (point 2100), situated on the Uganda-German East Africa frontier about 5 kilometers southwest of the point where the River Mavumba cuts this frontier;

Thence a line southeastward to meet the southern shore of Lake Mohazi;

Thence the watershed between the Taruka and the Mkarange Rivers and continuing southward to the northeastern end of Lake Mugesera;

Thence the median line of this lake and continuing southward across Lake Ssake to meet the Kagera;

Thence the course of the Kagera downstream to meet the western boundary of Buguli;

Thence this boundary to its junction with the eastern boundary of Urundi;

Thence to eastern and southern boundary of Urundi to Lake Tanganyika.

The frontier described above is shown on the attached British 1:1,000,000 map G. S. G. S. 2932. The boundaries of Buguli and Urundi are drawn as shown in the Deutscher Kolonialatlas (Dietrich-Reimer) scale 1:1,000,000 dated 1906.

ARTICLE 2.

A boundary commission shall be appointed by His Majesty the King of the Belgians and His Britannic Majesty to trace on the spot the line described in article I above.

In case any dispute should arise in connection with the work of these commissioners, the question shall be referred to the Council of the League of Nations, whose decision shall be final.

The final report by the Boundary Commission shall give the precise description of this boundary as actually demarcated on the ground; the necessary maps shall be annexed thereto and signed by the commissioners. The report, with its annexes, shall be made in triplicate; one copy shall be deposited in the archives of the League of Nations, one shall be kept by the Government of His Majesty the King of the Belgians, and one by the Government of His Britannic Majesty.

ARTICLE 3.

The mandatory shall be responsible for the peace, order, and good government of the territory, and shall undertake to promote to the utmost the material and moral well-being and the social progress of its inhabitants.

ARTICLE 4.

The mandatory shall not establish any military or naval bases, nor erect any fortifications, nor organize any native military force in the territory except for local police purposes and for the defense of the territory.

ARTICLE 5.

The mandatory—

(1) Shall provide for the eventual emancipation of all slaves and for as speedy an elimination of domestic and other slavery as social conditions will allow.

(2) Shall suppress all forms of slave trade.

(3) Shall prohibit all forms of forced or compulsory labor, except for public works and essential services, and then only in return for adequate remuneration.

(4) Shall protect the natives from measures of fraud and force by the careful supervision of labor contracts and the recruiting of labor.

(5) Shall exercise a strict control over the traffic in arms and ammunition and the sale of spirituous liquors.

ARTICLE 6.

In the framing of laws relating to the holding or transfer of land, the mandatory shall take into consideration native laws and customs, and shall respect the rights and safeguard the interests of the native population.

No native land may be transferred, except between natives, without the previous consent of the public authorities. No real rights over native land in favor of nonnatives may be created except with the same consent.

The mandatory will promulgate strict regulations against usury.

ARTICLE 7.

The mandatory shall secure to all nationals of states members of the League of Nations the same rights as are enjoyed by his own nationals in respect of entry into and residence in the territory, the protection afforded to their person and property, the acquisition of property, movable and immovable, and the exercise of their profession or trade, subject only to the requirements of public order, and on condition of compliance with the local law.

Further, the mandatory shall ensure to all nationals of states members of the League of Nations, on the same footing as to his own nationals, freedom of transit and navigation, and complete economic, commercial, and industrial equality; provided that the mandatory shall be free to organize public works and essential services on such terms and conditions as he thinks just.

Concessions for the development of the natural resources of the territory shall be granted by the mandatory without distinction on grounds of nationality between the nationals of all states members of the League of Nations, but on such conditions as will maintain intact the authority of the local government.

Concessions having the character of a general monopoly shall not be granted. This provision does not affect the right of the mandatory to create monopolies of a purely fiscal character in the interest of the territory under mandate, and in order to provide the territory with fiscal resources which seem best suited to the local requirements; or, in certain cases, to carry out the development of natural resources, either directly by the state, or by controlled agency, provided that there shall result therefrom no monopoly of the natural resources for the benefit of the mandatory or his nationals, directly or indirectly, nor any preferential advantage which shall be inconsistent with the economic, commercial, and industrial equality hereinbefore guaranteed.

The rights conferred by this article extend equally to companies and associations organized in accordance with the law of any of the members of the League of Nations, subject only to the requirements of public order, and on condition of compliance with the local law.

ARTICLE 8.

The mandatory shall insure in the territory complete freedom of conscience and the free exercise of all forms of worship which are consonant with public order and morality; missionaries who are nationals of states members of the League of Nations shall be free to enter the territory and to travel and reside therein, to acquire and possess property, to erect religious buildings, and to open schools throughout the territory; it being understood, however, that the mandatory shall have the right to exercise such control as may be necessary for the maintenance of public order and good government, and to take all measures required for such control.

ARTICLE 9.

The mandatory shall apply to the territory any general international conventions applicable to contiguous territories.

ARTICLE 10.

The mandatory shall have full powers of administration and legislation in the area subject to the mandate. This area shall be administered in accordance with the laws of the mandatory as an integral part of his territory and subject to the preceding provisions.

The mandatory shall therefore be at liberty to apply his laws to the territory under the mandate subject to the modifications required by local conditions, and to constitute the territory into a customs, fiscal, or administrative union or federation, with the adjacent possessions under his own sovereignty or control; provided always that the measures adopted to that end do not infringe the provisions of this mandate.

ARTICLE 11.

The mandatory shall make to the Council of the League of Nations an annual report to the satisfaction of the council. This report shall contain full information concerning the measure taken to apply the provisions of the present mandate.

ARTICLE 12.

The consent of the Council of the League of Nations is required for any modification of the terms of this mandate.

ARTICLE 13.

The mandatory agrees that if any dispute whatever should arise between the mandatory and another member of the League of Nations relating to the interpretation of the application of the provisions of the mandate, such dispute, if it can not be settled by negotiation, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of International Justice provided for by article 14 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Whereas the United States of America by participating in the war against Germany contributed to her defeat and to the renunciation of her rights and titles over her oversea possessions, but has not ratified the treaty of Versailles; and

Whereas the Government of the United States and the Government of the King of the Belgians desire to reach a definite understanding with regard to the rights of the two Governments and their respective nationals in the aforesaid former colony of German East Africa under the mandate of the King of the Belgians;

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Belgians have decided to conclude a convention to this effect and have nominated as their plenipotentiaries:

His Excellency the President of the United States of America,

Mr. Benjamin Thaw, jr., chargé d'affaires ad interim of the United States of America at Brussels, and

His Majesty the King of the Belgians:

Monsieur Henri Jaspar, his Minister for Foreign Affairs,

Who after having communicated to each other their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following provisions:

ARTICLE 1.

Subject to the provisions of the present convention the United States consents to the administration by the Government of the King of the Belgians, pursuant to the aforesaid mandate, of the former German territory described in article 1 of the mandate.

ARTICLE 2.

The United States and its nationals shall have and enjoy all the rights and benefits secured under the terms of articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the mandate to members of the League of Nations and their nationals, notwithstanding the fact that the United States is not a member of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE 3.

Vested American property rights in the mandated territory shall be respected and in no way impaired.

ARTICLE 4.

A duplicate of the annual report to be made by the mandatory under article 11 of the mandate shall be furnished to the United States.

ARTICLE 5.

Nothing contained in the present convention shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited above unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States.

ARTICLE 6.

The extradition treaties and conventions in force between the United States and Belgium shall apply to the mandated territory.

ARTICLE 7.

The present convention shall be ratified in accordance with the respective constitutional methods of the high contracting parties. The ratifications shall be exchanged in Brussels as soon as practicable. It shall take effect on the date of the exchange of ratifications.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty and have affixed thereto the seal of their arms.

Done in duplicate at Brussels this 18th day of April, 1923.

PROTOCOL.

Whereas the boundary of the mandate conferred upon His Majesty the King of the Belgians over the territory of Ruanda-Urundi, and recited in the preamble of the treaty concerning the mandate, concluded between the United States of America and Belgium on April 18, 1923, has been modified by a common accord between the British and Belgian Governments, with the approval given by the Council of the League of Nations at its meeting of the 31st of August, 1923, in order better to safeguard the interests of the native populations; and

Whereas by Article V of the treaty referred to above nothing contained in the treaty shall be affected by any modification which may be made in the terms of the mandate as recited in the treaty unless such modification shall have been assented to by the United States of America; and

Whereas the Government of the United States of America perceives no objection to the modification in question,

The Governments of the United States of America and Belgium have resolved to amend the treaty signed on April 18, 1923, between the two countries and have named for this purpose their respective plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America,

Mr. Henry P. Fletcher, Ambassador of the United States of America at Brussels,

His Majesty the King of the Belgians,

Mr. Henri Jasper, his Minister of Foreign Affairs; who, after having communicated each to the other their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed to the following amendatory articles to be taken as part of the treaty signed April 18, 1923:

ARTICLE 1.

Article 1 of the mandate recited in the preamble of the treaty signed April 18, 1923, shall be replaced by the following:

The territory over which a mandate is conferred upon His Majesty the King of the Belgians (hereinafter called the mandatory) comprises that part of the territory of the former colony of German East Africa situated to the west of the following line:

The midstream of the Kagera River from the Uganda boundary to the point where the Kagera River meets the western boundary of Bugufi; thence this boundary to its junction with the eastern boundary of Urundi; thence the eastern and southern boundary of Urundi to Lake Tanganyka.

The frontier described above is shown on the attached British map GSGS No. 2932–A, on the scale of 1: 1,000,000.

ARTICLE 2.

The present protocol shall be ratified in accordance with the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties. The ratifications shall be exchanged in Brussels on the same day as those of the treaty of April 18, 1923. It shall take effect on the date of exchange of ratifications.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present protocol and have affixed thereto the seal of their arms.

Done in duplicate at Brussels this 21st day of January, 1924.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 3, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

It is love and gratitude that lift us into greatness of soul, O Lord. We beseech Thee to endow us richly with these immortal graces. Give wisdom that we may know how to use authority and great discretion that the use of power may be restrained. Problems and difficulties yield to one solution and that is a high sense of right. Bless us with disinterested zeal for righteousness, with sound reasoning which gives release in channels of peace and happiness, and with a spiritual benediction which is the prime essential. All of these are the fruits of the Spirit of God. With sincerity of purpose, with quietness of temper, and with wise understanding help us to pass through the duties of this day—through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 1, 1924, was read and approved.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Postal Service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of the Postal Service. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, most people take the Postal Service of the United States as a matter of course. They want to tell something to a friend at a distant point in the country. They find a piece of paper and envelope, write the letter, stick a little piece of paper known as a "postage stamp," costing 2 cents, upon it, drop it into a box provided at a convenient point, and do not give a thought as to the work entailed in getting that letter from the box they placed it in to the person to whom it is directed. If they think about it at all it seems to them a perfectly natural thing that what happens should happen. They do not appreciate that the postal system is the biggest business in the country; that it takes more to run it than any other department of the Government; they only know that some way, somehow, it is a big noiseless machine that gives the "service" to them at a minimum of cost. The success of the machine is more vital to the best interests of the people of the United States than almost any other activity of the Government. It makes the wheels of business run, it brings friends and relatives into almost instant touch, and contributes in an immeasurable degree to the prosperity of the country.

If the Postal Service were abandoned, the people of the country would be in a panic and willing to pay infinitely more than they do to have it restored. The people want "service" and are willing to pay what the "service" costs. If the people of the country gave any thought to the subject at all, they would unanimously say that the faithful men and women who make possible the wonderful system are entitled to at least a fair living. The part of the system that most of the people come into contact with is the carrier who daily or several times daily hands to them their letters. They think he is a fine fellow and welcome him eagerly, but probably never give a thought as to whether he is well paid or poorly paid. They assume that he is getting well paid. If asked if he should be well paid, they would say that there was no question but that he should be paid as well as any other man who renders good service.

The arrival of the mail coach in the early days was an event in the settlement. The villagers gathered at the little post office and waited with eagerness for the mail. Letters were few and far between. It was an event to receive one. The cost was too great to the individual to write except upon the happening of important events. The facilities were meager. There was not that general acquaintance by people in one section of the country with those in another. The railroads, the telegraph, the telephone, and many other mediums of friendship and acquaintance and business relations had not been thought of. In 1800 the total expenditure for postage was $280,804. It has now grown to the immense sum of $533,827,925.

The old mail coach, with the villagers gathering at the post office, are memories of the past. It has given way to the rush of mail coaches, the mail trains, and the mail airplane, speeding across the country carrying messages to and fro with a speed incredible to our forefathers. The picturesque old post office has given way to the city and village carrier delivering letters, newspapers, packages, at our door, the rural carrier with his automobile speeding over concrete highways delivering mail to every nook and corner of our vast land. The economy in the length of the letter and the weight of the paper because of the great expense has given way to the sending of live chickens, eggs, all manner of farm produce, and the product of the manufacturing establishment by mail because of its cheapness.

In the early days of the Postal System of the country the people were very willing to pay almost any price to have their mail transmitted from one point to another. Our grandfathers paid 25 cents an ounce to have their letters sent to points 500 miles distant. Two cents now carries them thousands of miles. In 1837 the 16,000,000 people in the United States each spent 26 cents for postage. In 1923 the 111,000,000 people each spent $4.78. The total expenditure for Postal Service in 1837 was $3,288,319; in 1923 it had arisen to the great sum of $556,850,966.

In the growth of the Postal Service other features have been added as conveniences to the people that are not in fact an essential part of the system. One of these is the money-order service. This was first established in 1864 and has grown to immense proportions. In 1865 there were 419 money-order offices; 74,277 money orders were issued, of the value of $1,360,000. In 1923 there were 54,181 money-order offices, the total amount of money transmitted by domestic money orders was $1,388,000,080, and the number of separate orders was 173,083,817. In addition, in 1923 there were 1,201,312 orders issued to transmit $22,488,617 to foreign lands.

The Postal Savings System has imposed further duties upon the Postal Service. In a large measure the small-package parcel post has taken over the work formerly done by express companies. The extension of city and rural free delivery has added not only to the expense of the service but has contributed in an immeasurable degree to the comfort and convenience of the people.

A few figures with reference to the Rural Mail Service are interesting. This branch of the service was established in about 1897. The number of routes in that year was 82. They have increased until now there are 44,439 routes, covering 1,190,534 miles and costing $86,172,350. There are 3,066 counties in the United States and 2,730 of them have rural delivery service. The rural routes furnish service to approximately 29,845,232 individuals. The rural carriers covered during the fiscal year 1923 a total of 360,256,364 miles.

The railway mail service of the Post Office Department is but little known by the general public. There are 21,316 men engaged in this branch of the service. They handle and distribute the mail in the 4,726 railway post-office trains that cover 231,619 miles of railway. These cars covered 273,471,627 miles of travel in the last fiscal year. These clerks must know accurately all of the post offices of the whole country, and know by what route the mail they handle can most expeditiously reach the point of destination. During the last fiscal year they distributed in these cars 16,666,218,045 pieces of mail. They also handled 113,273,735 pieces of registered mail.

Since the establishment of the parcel post in 1913 it has grown to immense proportions. It now constitutes 70 per cent of the volume of mail. In 1917, 693,553,176 packages were carried. In 1923, 11,765,943,942. The aggregate weight of parcel post dispatched from the United States to foreign countries during the year was 38,888,000 pounds.

There are 51,613 post offices under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department, 893 first class, 2,931 second class, 10,437 third class, the postmasters of which are appointed by the President, and 37,352 fourth class. Pennsylvania with 2,969 has the greatest number of post offices, Kentucky is next with 2,600. Included in the number are Guam 1, Hawaii 94, Samoa 1, Porto Rico 92, Virgin Islands 5.

There were issued to postmasters during the fiscal year 1923:

Postage stamps	15,478,905,130
Special delivery stamps	62,370,100
Postal cards	1,253,195,951
Stamped envelopes	2,671,254,385
Newspaper wrappers	50,120,718

There were 88,741,153 pieces of mail registered, insured or sent C. O. D. during the fiscal year. There were 1,326,947,557 pounds of second-class mail handled; 19,238,548 pieces of mail went to the dead-letter office. Of these 74,863 contained money amounting to $109,517.66, and 153,483 contained drafts, checks, money orders amounting to $4,775,149.78.

Some idea of the magnitude of the foreign mail handled by the department is indicated by the fact that 415,828,337 pieces, exclusive of parcel post, were dispatched from the United States and 362,267,335 pieces received.

Insurance of mail is becoming more popular. During the fiscal year 140,545,734 parcels were insured, an increase of 14,211,853 over the preceding year.

Another activity of the Post Office Department that is increasing rapidly in popularity is the collect-on-delivery service. During the fiscal year 40,426,825 parcels were sent, which is an increase of 30.66 per cent over 1922.

I have referred to the many and varied activities of the Post Office Department to bring to your mind the close relation that it bears to the life of almost every individual in the country. It works so smoothly that many, many people do not give a thought to what it means to them. It has become an absolute essential to living and business. If its activities should cease for an instant the whole country would be in a panic.

I believe, therefore, that everyone should be desirous that the efficiency should continue and that those faithful servants of the people who make possible this wonderful achievement should be properly rewarded. I think that it is only necessary to direct the attention of the citizens to the situation to have them all join in a united chorus of assent to any action that may be taken to the end that those who labor in this important field of action that contributes so much to the happiness, comfort, and prosperity of the people as a whole should be allowed a sufficient amount of money to maintain themselves and their family upon a truly American scale.

It takes many hands and minds to do the tremendous amount of work necessary. There is work, hard work, for all of them, and many more could be used. The number of employees has not increased corresponding with the increase of work. The postal employees have not complained about that. They have gone to it and done it. They have showed a wonderful spirit of loyalty.

In the Post Office Department there are—

Clerks	57,183
City letter carriers	40,134
Watchmen	3,302
Rural carriers	44,312
Railway postal employees	21,316

Of these employees 45,271 clerks receive $1,800 per year or less; 40,128 city letter carriers receive $1,800 or less.

Before the war this might have been sufficient to provide an ordinary living for a man and his family. The value of money has changed very much. The salaries now paid to them are entirely out of line with the compensation paid to employees. The dollar of 1913 is now worth about 70 cents. There has also been a tendency toward a higher wage scale generally than prior to the war. The scale of letter carriers is as follows:

Scale of letter carriers.

	Per annum.	Per 30-day month	Per day.	Per hour.
First grade	$1,400	$116.67	$3.89	$0.4862
Second grade	1,500	125.00	4.17	.5212
Third grade	1,600	133.33	4.44	.5555
Fourth grade	1,700	141.67	4.72	.59
Fifth grade	1,800	150.00	5.00	.625

In the Railway Mail Service there are 19,361 clerks outside of the supervisory class. They are divided as to grades, as follows:

Clerks, grade 6, at $2,300 per annum	4,887
Clerks, grade 5, at $2,150 per annum	7,608
Clerks, grade 4, at $2,000 per annum	3,963
Clerks, grade 3, at $1,850 per annum	1,868
Clerks, grade 2, at $1,700 per annum	427
Clerks, grade 1, at $1,600 per annum	608

The scale of wages of the clerical force at present is, as follows:

Clerks at $1,400	2,899
Clerks at $1,500	6,014
Clerks at $1,600	6,075
Clerks at $1,700	3,253
Clerks at $1,800	27,030
Clerks at $1,900	950
Clerks at $2,000	6,577

There are 44,500 rural carriers. Their compensation varies as to the length of the route. The average salary is $1,830 per year. They are required to pay for their equipment out of their salaries. The average cost of equipment maintenance is $638, leaving an average net salary of $1,192.

There are several bills now before Congress relative to the increase of salaries of postal employees. In general, they provide for the increase of salaries of city delivery carriers to a maximum of $2,400, of clerks to the same amount, of railway postal clerks to a maximum of $2,600, of village carriers to a maximum of $1,600, and general increases to other employees, such as messengers, watchmen, motor-vehicle operators, mechanics, and garage men. Provision is also made for allowance to rural carriers of 6 cents per mile per month for maintenance of equipment. These maximums can only be attained after several years of service.

Practically all of the experts upon the cost of living agree that a man with a wife and two or three children require an income of $2,500 to support them upon an American scale of living. The present maximums are not now sufficient. They should be revised to meet the change in the value of the dollar.

The Postal Service should be self-sustaining and it should be sustaining upon a basis that will permit the granting of a living wage to the employees. Much of the mail is now carried at less than cost. The parcel post is now nearly 70 per cent of the business. I do not believe that it carries its part of the burden. A slight increase in the rates upon that service would not be a burden at all to the people.

The efficiency of the Postal Service is in danger. The turnover is growing. Efficiency can not be long maintained when there is the constant need of training new men. A postal employee to be efficient must be long in the service. The service must be made attractive to capable men. It can not be done when the employees can not live upon the salaries paid.

The time to act is now, to preserve and improve the efficiency of this wonderful system that is so important to the prosperity and happiness of the country. There is only one way to do it, and that is to provide in some way adequate pay for good men. The postal employees have been loyal and faithful. They have not laid down on the job. It has got to be done. Let us do it before it is too late. Let us do it now.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, desiring to play the part of courtesy, I now give notice that to-morrow morning following the reading of the Journal, I shall ask that a resolution of high privilege be requested to be immediately reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

GRAND CANYON OF THE COLORADO.

The SPEAKER. By a special order of the House the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] is allowed 30 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. And further, Mr. Speaker, if I may encroach on the patience of the House, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended to 50 minutes. I shall try to get through with less time, if possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for 50 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. On what subject?

Mr. CRAMTON. The Grand Canyon Park and its improvement.

Mr. DYER. Of course, the gentleman knows that this is unanimous-consent day.

Mr. CRAMTON. I know; but I am asking unanimous consent. It is a matter that is pending in conference in the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, writing straight from the heart to his young daughters, Thackeray, in a letter dated September 15, 1850, but only now published, speaks of a sunrise over the River Rhine, viewed from his hotel window at Cologne. Therein you find him saying, "Those magnificent spectacles of nature are like personal kindnesses from the Maker to us—and make me feel grateful." He who goes through life insensible of the beauties of inanimate nature all about him, who fails to look "through nature up to nature's God," is himself scarce animate.

Wordsworth still lives in his presentation of nature's charms and gifts. So in his lines—

> I have learned
> To look on nature, not as in the hour
> Of thoughtless youth, but hearing oftentimes
> The still, sad music of humanity,
> Nor harsh nor grating, though of ample power
> To chasten and subdue. And I have felt
> A presence that disturbs me with the joy
> Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
> Of something far more deeply interfused,
> Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
> And the ocean, and the living air,
> And the blue sky, and in the mind of man;
> A motion and a spirit, that impels
> All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
> And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still
> A lover of the meadows and the woods,
> And mountains; and of all that we behold
> From this green earth; of all the mighty world
> Of eye and ear, both what they half create,
> And what they perceive; well pleased to recognize
> In nature and the language of the sense,
> The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,
> The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
> Of all my moral being.

To no land has nature been more kind than ours as it rolls, mile upon mile, forest and meadow, lake, river and waterfall, mountain and desert waste, from ocean to ocean. And in all history no people has been more appreciative of the beauties of nature or has more sought "communion with her visible forms," to hear her speak her "various language."

Playgrounds abound and the movement for their acquisition and maintenance is rapidly extending. Through a constantly widening program of park areas, local, State, and national, that which is most distinctive, most appealing in its opportunity "to look on nature," or most effective in its power to rouse in man the "sense sublime" or to "glide into his darker musings, with a mild and healing sympathy that steals away their sharpness ere he is aware"—these places are being secured to the free public use of all our people for all time to come. The park of other lands and other times was the monopolized exponent of human selfishness, with "keep out" signs facing the multitudes. The American public park idea is unique and its crowning glory is the national park system. Therein are being enshrined nature's masterpieces, their beauties and wonders to be preserved and protected for the common use of all for all time to come. Whether it be preeminent in the glory of its trees, of a lake of unrivaled blue, of glaciers, of majestic peaks massing one upon another with eternal snow upon them, or one rising in solitary grandeur above a principality, of wild plant and animal life, of waterfalls that thrill and arouse, while they subdue, or of eroded chasms and precipices colored by nature with beauty that defies the imagination, whatever it offers to delight the human eye, is offered freely and unselfishly to all alike. Paraphrasing Longfellow, whatever fortune is denied me, "you can not rob me of free nature's grace," and in the Nation's playgrounds and scenic reservations—

You can not bar my constant feet to trace
The woods and lawns, by living stream, at eve;
Let health my nerves and finer fibers brace,
And I their toys to the great children leave;
Of fancy, reason, virtue, naught can me bereave.

Communion with nature chastens and subdues the ego, it conduces to unselfishness and willingness to serve and sacrifice, it modifies the will to exploit, to monopolize, it clears the vision as to relative values of temporary gain against the eternal. And yet there are those who can go about amidst these things with unseeing eyes and feel none of this. There are those who can only see the people who come to see, but not that which they come to see, who see the chance to exploit and fail to see the chance to serve.

I have been permitted glimpses, all too brief, of nearly all our national parks, including the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, which is the theme of my remarks here to-day. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Cameron v. United States (252 U. S. p. 456) said of it:

It is the greatest eroded canyon in the United States, if not in the world, is over a mile in depth, has attracted wide attention among explorers and scientists, affords an unexampled field for geologic study, is regarded as one of the great natural wonders, and annually draws to its borders thousands of visitors.

Long you may have looked forward to seeing this great wonder of nature, but in the end it comes upon you with sudden surprise, this great gash 10 miles wide, the mighty Colorado, a seeming thread of water as it courses through, a mile below you and several miles away, the canyon stretching miles beyond the reach of eye and up and down the winding river. And then you ask with the poet:

Who can paint
Like nature? Can imagination boast,
Amid its gay creation, hues like hers,
Or can it mix them with that matchless skill * * *?

The Grand Canyon belongs to the world. Man may attend and preserve but must not monopolize nor exploit, and no private use can be permitted to mar the superior use of all.

When H. R. 5078, the Interior Department appropriation bill, carrying appropriations for the national parks, and in my charge as chairman of the subcommittee, was pending in the House the following amendment, offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], was accepted by me and was adopted:

For the purchase of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail within the Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz., as contemplated by the "Act to establish the Grand Canyon National Park in the State of Arizona," approved February 26, 1919, $100,000, to be available until expended for payment to the county of Coconino, State of Arizona, for the construction, under the supervision of the National Park Service, of a road from Maine, Ariz., to the south boundary of the Grand Canyon National Park: Provided, That no part of such sum shall be expended until after the delivery of a good and sufficient deed by the proper authorities of said county conveying to the United States full and complete title to the said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail, and acceptance thereof by the Secretary of the Interior.

This paragraph has been stricken out of the bill in the Senate and is now in conference.

While it was under consideration in the Senate the following statement was made:

This trail is a great asset to Coconino County. A few months ago a little clique got together out at Flagstaff, without the knowledge of the people of Flagstaff, without the knowledge of the people of the county, and in crafty maneuvering made this deal and now want us to swallow it. Why has a Congressman a right to go out and make a private deal with a board of supervisors, even if they—the supervisors—had a right to make this deal? The board of supervisors of Coconino County have no more right to sell an asset of the county until it is voted on by the people of that county than I have to try to sell the United States Capitol. Here is a Congressman, who is chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House [Mr. CRAMTON], and my friend from Arizona, Mr. CARL HAYDEN, who is now and for many years has been Representative from our State, making a deal of the assets of the county when they knew, or should have known, $100,000 would do but very little good on this road, and at the same time they knew the forestry department planned spending $750,000 on this same road. I do not know whether these gentlemen understand the situation or not, but before they go into a deal of that kind they should know that there should be some justification and merit to the proposition.

By reason of this statement, and by reason of my deep interest in protection of this great national park and all others against encroachment of private interests, and their proper development and accessibility for the great public use, I am taking this occasion to place before this House and before the country the facts as to the existing situation at the Grand Canyon and the truth as to what the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], and myself are trying to do.

In making this statement I am not attacking individuals in Washington but conditions in Arizona and defending public use against private interest. I have some understanding of the parliamentary rules that govern the Congress, have a real respect for them, and seek always to obey them, even on occasions when it is most inconvenient to do so and when there appears very just cause for not doing so.

The Hayden amendment proposes to buy the Bright Angel Trail from the county of Coconino, paying $100,000 therefor, that money to be expended upon the approach road to the Grand Canyon from the Santa Fe Trail under direction of the National Park Service. By its enactment it is sought (1) to improve an approach road to the south rim or Arizona side of the Grand Canyon, (2) to eliminate private ownership of the Bright Angel Trail, (3) to conserve a cordial spirit of cooperation with Coconino County, and (4) to eliminate private interests that now by opposition, intrusion, hostility, and violence handicap and prevent proper development of the park for public use and safe enjoyment of the canyon by the public.

The four purposes are all highly desirable, and it is important to the public interest that they be accomplished. In what I have to say I am emphasizing the public interest in having these things accomplished. For parliamentary reasons, if for no other, I will not emphasize interests that do not desire such accomplishment.

1. THE APPROACH ROAD.

In my contact with the national park problem I have taken keen interest in the rapidly increasing public attendance, from 356,097 in 1916 to 1,403,712 the past season. The Grand Canyon was made a national park in 1919 when its attendance was 37,745, while for 1923 it was 102,166. Particularly the increase of auto travel to the parks has interested me because it is by that means of travel, with attendant camping possibilities, that enjoyment of the parks becomes possible for the numerous nature lovers of small means. Into the Grand Canyon came 1,575 private autos in 1919 and 11,731 in 1923. Our committee has been glad to cooperate with Director Mather in providing conveniences, camping-ground facilities, and roads in the parks for the motorists. It is also highly important that the approach roads to the parks be such as to make them accessible to motorists. Ordinarily the roads outside the parks are the responsibility of the locality, county or State, and in many cases the roads so provided are better than park funds have yet provided in the parks.

There are cases where it is apparent the approach roads must be built by Federal funds, if at all.

Such has long been recognized to be the case in connection with the Yellowstone Park, where $517,100 of Federal funds has been expended since 1897, as shown by the following:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, February 28, 1924.

[Memorandum for the Hon. CARL HAYDEN, House of Representatives.]

The following is a statement showing the amounts appropriated for approach roads in the forest reserve leading out of Yellowstone National Park from the east and south boundaries:

Fiscal year.	East boundary.	South boundary.	East and south boundaries.
1897			[1] $5,000
1901	$20,000

STEPHEN T. MATHER, Director.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I would prefer not to yield unless I fail to make myself clear. I hope to be able to answer questions when I have gotten through my remarks.

The south approach to the Grand Canyon may very properly be deemed another case.

In the recent hearing on H. R. 3682 before the House Committee on Public Lands Mr. Horace Albright, field assistant to the Director of the National Park Service, showed how little has been done in the way of Federal funds for roads even within this park. He said, in part:

This park is one that has had no assistance whatever from the Federal Government, except the appropriation last year of $40,000 to improve the surface of 8 miles running out from El Tovar Hotel along the rim, which was built by the Santa Fe Railroad. All the other roads in the park, total of 91 miles, were built by the county or by the State of Arizona and a little bit of road built on the north rim by the people who come down from Utah, sightseers and railroad men, investigating the possibilities of development there—

And so forth.

Of one road outside the park he says:

The Santa Fe Railroad has built with its own funds this year a road which makes a short cut to the Navajo Reservation and will further improve that road this summer so that hereafter one can go out during most of the year from El Tovar to the Navajo Reservation, get a view not only of the Navajos at work but of the Hopis, at Monencopi Village, and get back the same night. That piece of work is very commendable, and we owe a debt of gratitude to the foresight of the railroad in getting that road built.

As to approach roads from the south, little has been done and it seems little is to be expected for some years from any source except through Federal funds expended through the National Park Service.

The Santa Fe Trail, now an improved roadway, runs through Flagstaff and Williams. Its point nearest to the park entrance is Maine, halfway between Flagstaff and Williams. A road from Maine to the park now exists, a dirt road, in fair condition at its best, but impassable at times. It is about 60 miles from Maine to El Tovar. The county of Coconino is the second largest in area in the United States, with consequently large road problems. Its area is so largely, however, taken up with forest reserves, public lands, national park, and Indian reservations that only 11 per cent of its area is subject to taxation. So while the county is alive to the importance of improvement of this road it can do little for some time to come.

While much of this road is through Federal forest reserve and that service is expending very large amounts for road building and has been said to "be willing to assist us in building this road," nothing from the Forest Service can be expected for years to come. It has been said also concerning this road:

The Government has planned, which is its duty, the construction of a real road out of the forestry fund to the extent of $750,000 within the next two or three years.

Vain hope. The palsying effect of high influence seems to be upon the Forest Service when I have the past few days tried to get an explicit statement from them as to their plans for this road. They say:

The Forest Service is not in a position to undertake construction on this road at this time.

And again:

Just how soon the project will be definitely approved for construction can not be estimated—

And so forth.

When our conference was held at El Tovar there were present F. C. W. Pooler, district forester, and G. W. Kimball, forest supervisor, and allocation for this road by the Forest Service was strongly urged upon them by me. They were not overawed by any such official influence and outlined the situation frankly, making it clear that no help for this road from the Forest Service could be reasonably expected for many years.

The rapid increase in auto travel to the Grand Canyon makes imperative improvement of this road. There is no prospect for such improvement except through this appropriation; such action by the Federal Government is equitable, just, and proper.

2. THE TOLL TRAIL.

The Bright Angel Toll Trail, which "descends the south wall of the canyon to the floor, lying some 4,300 feet below the rim, starts within a few hundred yards of the terminus of the railroad and the end of the main public highway, which bring practically all the visitors to the south rim of the Grand Canyon."

It descends precipitately, and can only be traveled on foot or upon sure-footed animals, mules being customarily used.

Recently its history has been told most succinctly by Senator ASHURST, of Arizona, as follows:

Long prior to the time the Grand Canyon became a national park, indeed long prior to the time the Grand Canyon became a national monument or a reserve of any kind or character, the laws of the Territory of Arizona authorized citizens of the United States to build, establish, and maintain a toll road for the collection of tolls from persons who traveled upon and over such trail or road. I can best give a history of the Bright Angel Toll Trail by reading a copy of a letter I wrote to the county attorney of Coconino County, Ariz., some time ago upon this subject.

I read my reply to him, as follows:

JUNE 1, 1922.

Hon. F. M. GOLD,

County Attorney, Flagstaff, Ariz.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: Yours of the 26th ultimo just received advising that in your efforts to protect the interests of Coconino County in and to the Bright Angel Toll Trail in the Grand Canyon you require a complete statement of all the facts showing the county's title to the trail.

I am sending you by registered mail, under separate cover, a bound book entitled "Duffield v. Ashurst," which contains all the data or papers I possess respecting this subject. This book contains some of the pleadings, briefs, and other documents making up the record in the case involving the title of Coconino County to the Bright Angel Toll Trail. * * *

About January 31, 1891, Peter D. Berry, under the statutes of Arizona of 1887, filed in the office of the county recorder of Yavapai County (Coconino County was created later) a certificate and plat marking out a sort of map of definite location of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail and claimed a toll road franchise thereon.

Subsequently the said Berry, by deeds of conveyance, transferred, or attempted to transfer his interest in said toll trail to Mr. RALPH H. CAMERON; these deeds are recorded in book 9 of deeds and book 10 of deeds, records of Coconino County.

In January, 1901, the Board of Supervisors of Coconino County attempted to extend said toll-road franchise for a period of 10 years, but had no power to extend same for a longer period than 5 years.

In 1903 the district court of Coconino County, sitting at nisi prius, held the deeds to CAMERON to be void, and Berry and his partners thereupon resumed possession of the Bright Angel Toll Trail.

In February, 1906, the said toll-road franchise of Berry et al. expired, and the Board of Supervisors of Coconino County thereupon contracted with Mr. L. L. Ferrall to collect tolls thereon for Coconino County.

In 1907 the Territorial legislature, by act thereof, extended the franchise for an additional five years.

This act of the legislature of 1907 reinstating the said toll-trail franchise in the original locators or owners of the franchise was, by the supreme court of the Territory, declared to be a valid act. See Duffield v. Ashurst (100 Pacific Reporter, p. 821).

The franchise again expired in 1912 and the franchise thereupon reverted to Coconino County. By this time I had come to the Senate, hence I do not know what has happened in Arizona in the courts or in the office of the board of supervisors of Coconino County respecting this trail; but in 1918, when Mr. HAYDEN and I drew the bill creating the Grand Canyon National Park, we used extreme care to see to it that all the rights of Coconino County in or to the Bright Angel Trail should be and were protected and recognized, and the language of the park act is as follows:

"SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States, whether for homestead, mineral, right of way, or any other purpose whatsoever, or shall affect the rights of any such claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of his land, and nothing herein contained shall affect, diminish, or impair the right and authority of the county of Coconino, in the State of Arizona, to levy and collect tolls for the passage of livestock over and upon the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to negotiate with the said county of Coconino for the purchase of said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail and all rights therein, and report to Congress at as early a date as possible the terms upon which the property can be procured."

You are to be commended for your efforts to protect the county's rights, and I hope this letter may give you the information you wish, or at least may inform you where the records may be obtained.

I regret my inability to supply complete data, but human memory is at best uncertain. A careful abstracter of titles could easily find copious information and records of the various muniments or papers showing the county's title, as they are all on record in the office of the county recorder, the office of the clerk of the board of supervisors, and the office of the clerk of the court in Flagstaff. The filing of Berry is on record in Yavapai County.

The Federal Government recognizes Coconino County's title to this trail to be in full life and validity.

* * * * * * *

With best wishes,

Sincerely yours, HENRY F. ASHURST.

Not knowing precisely when the county of Coconino assumed custody of the Bright Angel Trail and began the collection of tolls on the trail in the Grand Canyon, I wired Mr. J. B. Rickel, the clerk of the Board of Supervisors of Coconino County, the county in which the trail is situated, and he replied on February 15 last, as follows:

"Regarding your wire, Coconino County assumed custody of Bright Angel Toll Trail on April 18, 1912."

The tolls that were paid to Coconino County amounted for the period October 1, 1919, to October 1, 1920, to $6,619. From October 1, 1920, to September 30, 1921, by a singular circumstance, the same number of dollars, to wit, $6,619. For the period October 1, 1921, to September 30, 1922, $6,759, and from October 1, 1922, to September 30, 1923, $7,130.

The formal efforts of the Federal Government, since the designation of the Grand Canyon as a national park, to secure the trail are set forth in the following report to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 11, 1923.

The honorable the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The act of Congress approved February 26, 1919, entitled "An act to establish the Grand Canyon National Park in the State of Arizona" provides, among other things:

"That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States, whether for homestead, mineral, right of way, or any other purpose whatsoever, or shall affect the rights of any such claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of his land, and nothing herein contained shall affect, diminish, or impair the right and authority of the county of Coconino, in the State of Arizona, to levy and collect tolls for the passage of livestock over and upon the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to negotiate with the said county of Coconino for the purchase of said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail and all rights therein, and report to Congress at as early a date as possible the terms upon which the property can be procured."

In compliance with this provision of law I have the following report to make to you:

The Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail, which descends the south wall of the canyon to the floor, lying some 4,300 feet below the rim, starts within a few hundred yards of the terminus of the railroad and the end of the main public highway, which bring practically all the visitors to the south rim of the Grand Canyon. At this point there are also concentrated the hotels and camps available for the accommodation of the visitors and the administrative headquarters of the National Park Service that has charge, under the Interior Department, of the administration of the park. This trail is the only means of access into the canyon for 20 miles to the east, where the Grand View Trail is located, and 8 miles to the west, where the Hermit Trail is located. The trail has been privately owned, the present title, so far as can be ascertained, being duly vested in the county of Coconino, which adjoins the park on the south; and the above provision of law in the organic act creating the Grand Canyon National Park appears to recognize rights of the county of Coconino in said trail. The county has collected from the public operator a toll of $1 for every visitor carried on horse or mule back over the trail, it being understood that tolls for some 7,681 visitors were paid for such use of the trail the past year.

The great importance to the United States of having ownership of this trail for the unrestricted use of the public is apparent, and the importance of its acquisition was fully emphasized by the injunction of Congress in the organic act above cited.

In compliance with the provisions of this law, negotiations between representatives of the department and the Board of Supervisors of the county of Coconino, Ariz., as representatives of that county, were carried on for several years without definite results. During the past summer, however, and in the presence of visiting Members of Congress, the following proposition was informally agreed upon as appearing fair and reasonable under the circumstances to both parties involved, namely, that in the event Congress shall appropriate not less than the sum of $100,000 to be expended upon the reconstruction and improvement of a road between Maine, Ariz.—which is a small town lying midway between the towns of Williams and Flagstaff, Ariz., on the National Old Trails Road about 80 miles away—and the south boundary of the Grand Canyon National Park, which will constitute then the most important highway approach to the park, the Board of Supervisors of the county of Coconino will execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed conveying to the United States the full and complete title to the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail.

It was ascertained that the provisions of existing Arizona law require the selling of any property, real or personal, belonging to the county, at public auction, after certain prescribed regulations have been complied with, to the highest bidder, and if Congress directs the acquisition of the trail under agreements informally arrived at and stated above, the county has agreed to offer the trail for sale at public auction in accordance with the statutes above mentioned, with the understanding that a bid is to be made by a representative of the United States of the sum of $100,000 for said trail under the conditions stated. If the bid is accepted, no part of this sum will be paid over to the county until a satisfactory deed has been executed and delivered, vesting full and complete title in the trail in the United States.

It is my purpose to submit through the proper channels draft of legislation which when enacted will authorize the appropriation of the sum of $100,000 to enable the Secretary of the Interior to effect these purposes and in the following words:

"That for the purchase of the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail within the Grand Canyon National Park, Ariz., the sum of $100,000 is hereby authorized to be expended out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; this amount to be available for payment to the Board of Supervisors of the county of Coconino, State of Arizona, for the purpose of construction, under the supervision of the National Park Service, of the approach road to the south entrance to the Grand Canyon National Park, from Maine, Ariz., to the south boundary of the park, upon the delivery of good and sufficient deed of conveyance to the United States of full and complete title to the said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail and acceptance thereof by the Secretary of the Interior."

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK, Secretary.

It is apparent that it is highly undesirable that a toll road or trail exist in a great national park. At the best it is not to be tolerated. At the worst there enter in such complications as make the Grand Canyon situation one that must not be allowed to continue.

The Federal Government has not been the only applicant for control of all or part of the Bright Angel Trail.

At the regular meeting of the board of supervisors in May, 1922, one RALPH H. CAMERON proposed a lease of the Bright Angel Trail, the form of lease proposed by him being as follows:

This agreement, made and entered into in duplicate this — day of ———, 1922, by and between the county of Coconino, State of Arizona, the party of the first part, and RALPH H. CAMERON, of the county of Coconino, State of Arizona, party of the second part, witnesseth that—

Whereas the party of the first part is the owner of that certain toll road running from the rim of Grand Canyon of the Colorado River, at a point near the terminus of the Grand Canyon Railroad, down into said Grand Canyon, said toll road having heretofore been, and now being, known as the Bright Angel Toll Road or Trail; and

Whereas it is deemed for the best interests of the county and of the public that said toll road shall not be declared a free highway, but that the county shall collect toll thereon; and

Whereas the character of said toll road is such that the same should be at all times kept in first-class repair and should be carefully looked after and cared for; and

Whereas it is deemed for the best interests of the county of Coconino that a competent person be engaged to look after the repair and maintaining of said road and the operation thereof, including the collection of tolls thereon; and

Whereas the party of the second part is thoroughly acquainted with said road and is deemed competent to take charge thereof for the purposes aforesaid and to perform the duties incident thereto in a capable and satisfactory manner.

Now, therefore, the said party of the first part hereby leases, lets, and demises unto the said party of the second part the said Bright Angel Toll Road or Trail aforesaid for the term of five years from the date hereof.

The party of the second part, in consideration of the premises and the covenants and agreements on the part of the party of the first part, hereby covenants and agrees that he will pay to the party of the first part as rent for said toll road the sum of $1,875.24 per annum, said rent to be paid in quarterly installments on the 1st day of ———, ———, ———, and ——— of each year during the term of said lease.

The said party of the second part does hereby undertake and agree for said term of five years from the — day of ———, 1922, to take charge of said Bright Angel Toll Road or Trail, and to maintain and care for the same and keep it in such good condition and repair as shall be practicable in order to make the same reasonably safe and easy to travel, and agrees to take charge of the collection of tolls upon said road in the amounts and manner hereafter authorized.

Said party of the second part also agrees that during the term of this contract he will furnish all labor and material that may be required in order to keep said road in good condition and repair as herein provided.

In consideration of the premises and the covenants and agreements of the party of the second part herein contained, the party of the first part agrees that said second party shall be entitled to receive and retain for his own use and benefit all of the tolls collected by him on said road.

The said party of the first part in consideration of the premises and to the end that the contract may be properly carried out and performed by all the parties hereto, does hereby authorize and empower the said second party to take charge of said toll road for the purpose of maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and collecting tolls thereon, during the term of this contract, and does hereby authorize and empower the said second party to do and perform all things that shall be necessary or proper to properly maintain said toll road and keep the same in good repair and condition, and to collect tolls thereon.

And the party of the first part does hereby further authorize the said party of the second part to collect upon said toll road tolls at the rate of $1 per head for each animal led, driven, or ridden or passing over or upon the said toll road or any part thereof, or such other or different tolls as now are or may hereafter be authorized by law.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto have caused these presents to be executed the day and year first above mentioned.

COUNTY OF COCONINO,

By ——— ———,

Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of Said County.

Attest:

———— ————,

Clerk of the Board of Supervisors of Coconino County.

The validity of this lease was referred to Mr. F. M. Gold, as county attorney of Coconino County, who advised against entering into it on the ground it was neither legal nor for the best interests of the county. It being deemed possible that CAMERON might nevertheless secure the lease, a protest was filed with the board in the name of I. L. Hubbard, general manager of the Santa Fe Railroad Co. This protest later was withdrawn. Thereupon, in order to forestall the Cameron lease, a more favorable offer was presented by Mr. Ed. Hamilton, of Williams, Ariz., and nothing resulted.

On or about May 18, 1922, Mr. CAMERON came back with a proposed contract under which he was to have free use of this trail for transportation of his livestock, supplies, and equipment for use in operation of his mining claims in the canyon. This second Cameron lease was advised against by Gold, on account of a recital it contained with reference to ownership of part of the trail in Cameron. The county attorney was requested by the board to prepare a contract. Mr. Gold did so, it being as follows:

AGREEMENT.

This agreement, made and entered into this — day of May, A. D. 1922, by and between the county of Coconino, State of Arizona, through its board of supervisors, hereinafter called party of the first part, and ——— ———, of the State of Pennsylvania, hereinafter called the party of the second part, witnesseth:

That for and in consideration of the sum of $1 and other good and valuable considerations, in hand paid to the party of the first part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part gives, grants, and extends to the said party of the second part the right and privilege of using what is commonly called and known as the Bright Angel Trail, located on the south rim of the Grand Canyon near the terminus of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., and extending down into the canyon, in Coconino County, Ariz., for the use of pack animals in transporting and conveying materials for all kinds of construction work desired to be performed by the said party of the second part in the Grand Canyon.

It is mutually agreed that the pack animals mentioned above shall be used in such transportation only at such times as not to impede or interfere with the tourist traffic upon said trail.

The party of the second part further agrees that he will not permit the pack animals on the return trip to run promiscuously over and across the trail, but will so guide and conduct said pack animals that they will use the trail in both descending and ascending.

It is further mutually agreed that nothing in this agreement will authorize or permit the said party of the second part to use animals in the tourist business without compensating the said party of the first part for the use of said trail.

It is mutually agreed that this agreement shall extend for a period of five years from date hereof and shall be binding upon the successors and assigns of the party of the first part and the executors, administrators, and assigns of the party of the second part.

In witness whereof, the said party of the first part has caused this instrument to be executed by its chairman and attested by its clerk and its seal to be attached hereto and the party of the second part has hereunto set his hand the day and year first above written.

This gave CAMERON all he had any right to ask but eliminated the jokers. This CAMERON refused to consider.

About July 18, 1922, Mr. CAMERON proposed another contract in the name of S. E. Queiroz, which was as follows:

AGREEMENT.

This agreement made and entered into, in duplicate, this — day of ———, 1922, by and between the county of Coconino, State of Arizona, the party of the first part, and S. E. Queiroz, of Elkins Park, Pa., party of the second part.

Witnesseth, that—

Whereas the party of the first part is the owner of a certain trail or toll road known as the Bright Angel Trail, within the county of Coconino, State of Arizona, running from a point on the south rim of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River near the terminus of the Grand Canyon Railroad, running thence down into said Grand Canyon in a general northeasterly direction to a point in the vicinity of what is known as the Indian Garden; and

Whereas the party of the second part is the owner of certain mining claims and property extending between the northerly terminus of the said Bright Angel Trail and the Colorado River in said Grand Canyon, upon and over which there is a trail connecting with the northern terminus of the said Bright Angel Trail and extending to the said Colorado River known as the Cameron Trail, which said trail extends in a general northeasterly direction from the terminus of said Bright Angel Trail to a point on the Colorado River; and

Whereas there is situated on the said Bright Angel Trail certain buildings owned and controlled by the party of the second part; and

Whereas the party of the second part may desire to construct and maintain certain other buildings upon the said Bright Angel Trail, owned by the party of the first part, as aforesaid; and

Whereas the party of the first part desires to use the trail known as the Cameron Trail, heretofore designated as passing over and upon the property of the party of the second part, for the purpose of transporting tourists between the said rim of the said Grand Canyon and the Colorado River; and

Whereas the party of the second part desires to convey freight and supplies from the rim of said canyon over the said trails to the Colorado River for the purpose of conducting mining operations upon the mining claims and property of the party of the second part; and

Whereas the party of the first part desires to have the said Bright Angel Trail surveyed for the purpose of definitely fixing and determining the termini and courses of said trail:

Now, therefore, this agreement further witnesseth, that in consideration of the sum of $5, lawful money of the United States of America in hand paid by the party of the second part to the party of the first part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by the party of the first part, and in further consideration of all the terms, covenants, promises, and conditions herein embraced, it is hereby mutually understood and agreed as follows:

First. That the party of the second part hereby recognizes the ownership of the party of the first part in and to the Bright Angel Trail, extending from the said south rim of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River to the point in the vicinity of the said Indian Garden, said point to be hereafter determined by said survey, to be made by the party of the second part, and said second party hereby grants to the party of the first part all interest, right, or title now or heretofore vested in him to the said Bright Angel Trail, excepting title to said buildings owned by second party situated upon said trail, and the party of the first part hereby recognizes the ownership and title of the party of the second part in and to the mining claims, property, and trail hereinbefore described as the Cameron Trail, and extending from the northern terminus of the said Bright Angel Trail (said terminus of the trail to be hereafter determined by said survey) to the Colorado River, and the party of the first part hereby grants and conveys to the party of the second part all of its right and title in and to the said Cameron Trail and the mining claims and property of the party of the second part over and upon which said Cameron Trail extends. And the party of the first part further grants and conveys to the party of the second part the right, privilege, and easement to convey over, along, and upon the said Bright Angel Trail all freight, machinery, supplies, equipment, laborers, and employees, etc., by the use of pack animals, or otherwise, to and upon the said Cameron Trail, together with the right of ingress and egress over said Bright Angel Trail to the property of said second party on the Colorado River, and also the right to build, construct, and maintain such other buildings upon the said Bright Angel Trail as may be deemed necessary by the party of the second part in connection with the business that may be conducted by the party of the second part upon such mining claims, or any of them, provided, however, that none of said buildings shall interfere with the reasonable use and enjoyment of the said Bright Angel Trail by the party of the first part as a trail or toll road.

It is further agreed that the party of the first part shall have the right, for the period of five years from the date of this agreement, to transport passengers and tourists in, over, along, and upon the said Cameron Trail from the northern terminus of the said Bright Angel Trail to the Colorado River, and shall have the right to charge and collect toll from such tourists and passengers and to receive and retain said toll as the property of the party of the first part for the period of five years from and after the date of the execution of this agreement: Provided, however, That the said party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part for the rights and privileges in this paragraph granted a yearly rental of one dollar ($1) during the said period of five years, said yearly rental to be payable in advance, the first of said payments to be made at the execution of this agreement.

The party of the second part hereby agrees that within the period of one year from the date of the execution of this agreement he shall survey, or cause to be surveyed, the said Bright Angel Trail from the south rim of said Grand Canyon throughout its courses to the northern terminus to be fixed and determined definitely, said survey to be made at the expense of the party of the second part, and said northern terminus of said trail when so fixed and determined by the party of the second part shall constitute and be the junction and starting point between the said trails, and shall be forever binding upon both parties hereto.

That all rights and controversies that may hereafter arise between the parties hereto concerning the right, title, interest, claim, or ownership in or to said trails, or either of them, in the future, shall be determined and controlled by the terms of this agreement and the rights, titles, and interest herein granted and not otherwise.

That all the terms, covenants, conditions, agreements, and rights herein specified shall inure to the successors, heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of the respective parties hereto.

In witness whereof, the party of the second part has duly executed this agreement and the party of the first part has caused the same to be signed by the chairman of its board of supervisors, attested by the clerk of its board of supervisors thereunto duly authorized by resolution, with the seal of said board of supervisors thereunto affixed.

Executed, in duplicate, the day and year first above written.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF THE COUNTY OF COCONINO, STATE OF ARIZONA.

———— ————,
Chairman of said Board.

Attest:

———— ————,
Clerk of the Board of Supervisors,
Coconino County, State of Arizona.

S. E. DE QUEIROZ,
Party of the Second Part.

You will note this Queiroz lease sought express recognition by Coconino County of ownership by him of the so-called Cameron Trail, or the Bright Angel Trail, to the Colorado River, and ownership by him of certain buildings "situated on the said Bright Angel Trail," provided for a survey by Queiroz to determine the limits of the Bright Angel Trail, and also contained a grant from Coconino County to Queiroz of "the right to build, construct, and maintain such other buildings upon the said Bright Angel Trail as may be deemed necessary" by Queiroz.

In this altruistic contract the respective limits of the trails of the two parties were to be determined solely by Queiroz and to "be forever binding upon both parties." Patently, Queiroz stood for CAMERON.

I do not hesitate to say that so crafty, overreaching a contract as that sought by one individual at the expense of his own community, to say nothing of the rights of a Nation, that were sought to be imperiled thereby, marks its proponent as strangely lacking in civic pride and insensible of the common welfare. Due to opposition of Gold and others, this contract was not accepted.

Against private interests so insistent and resourceful the greatest vigilance is necessary to protect the public interest. The Federal Government should at the earliest possible date take over the title of Coconino County in the Bright Angel Trail.

3. CORDIAL COOPERATION WITH COCONINO COUNTY.

So far as use of the trail itself is concerned, the Federal Government could build elsewhere a new trail for $50,000 to $75,000 that would supersede all need of the use of the toll trail. It is to be remembered, however, that the Grand Canyon National Park and the county of Coconino must, in the nature of things, always be neighbors, and mutual friendship, confidence, and trust are highly desirable. The county has shown a fine spirit, a willingness to cooperate, and deserves to be met in the same spirit by the Federal Government.

For some time it has sought to dispose of its title in the Bright Angel Trail to the National Government and had recently proposed that if the Government would buy the trail, which is now netting the county from four to five thousand dollars a year in revenue, the county would spend the entire purchase price in improvement of this approach road from Maine.

Accompanied by my colleague, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], ranking minority member on the committee, I visited the Grand Canyon late in March, 1923. Saturday evening, March 31, we held an extended conference concerning this matter at the Hotel El Tovar. There were present the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], Mr. W. C. Rittenhouse, and Mr. R. E. Taylor, members of the board of supervisors of Coconino County; Mr. J. B. Rickel, clerk of the board; and Mr. Frank Harrison, county attorney. There were also present Mr. F. R. Goodman, State engineer of Arizona; Mr. F. C. Pooler, district forester; Mr. G. W. Kimball, forest supervisor; Mr. Horace M. Albright, superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park and field assistant to the Director of the National Park Service. The whole situation was thoroughly canvassed and resulted in a complete agreement on the part of all present that the program set forth in the Hayden amendment should, if possible, be carried out, Congress appropriating $100,000 for improvement of the Maine approach road, to be available after proper deed of the Bright Angel Trail to the Government. Naturally Mr. CARTER and myself were careful to state plainly to these gentlemen that we could bind no one but ourselves and could not speak for Congress. We did, however, indorse the program and promised to do what we could to carry it out. That we have done and are doing. Subsequent events and further consideration have only confirmed my judgment as to the propriety, wisdom, and necessity of this program.

Sunday noon we met at lunch in Flagstaff 20 or 30 of the most influential citizens of Flagstaff and the proposal contained in the Hayden amendment was indorsed by all. Mr. RALPH CAMERON was not, however, at the El Tovar conference or at the luncheon at Flagstaff, not being in the State at the time.

4. THE ELIMINATION OF PRIVATE INTERESTS THAT NOW BY OPPOSITION, INTRUSION, HOSTILITY, AND VIOLENCE HANDICAP AND PREVENT PROPER DEVELOPMENT OF THE PARK FOR PUBLIC USE AND SAFE ENJOYMENT OF THE CANYON BY THE PUBLIC.

This is the crux of the whole matter. The other considerations are desirable, this is imperative.

Proper development of the park has been thwarted by private interests, enjoyment of the park by the public is actually made hazardous by private interests, trespassers on the public domain, whose claims have been overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States, but who presume upon circumstances and plank themselves in the path of progress, veritable dogs in the manger, snapping and snarling at the National Government and endangering every park visitor who goes over the Bright Angel Trail.

These obstacles in the way of progress are, briefly speaking, the Cameron claims.

I had heard something of the situation and in response to my request the Secretary of the Interior gave me the following statement nearly two years ago:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 4, 1922.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
Chairman Subcommittee on Department of Interior
Appropriations, House of Representatives, United States.

DEAR MR. CRAMTON: I have before me your letter of March 27 addressed to Director Mather, of the National Park Service, in which you state that you understand that there has been in the past some controversy or disagreement between the Interior Department and Mr. CAMERON, of Arizona, involving some of the lands now included within the Grand Canyon National Park, and that you would like to have a statement of what the records of the department show as to the nature and outcome of such controversies. In reply I have to advise you relative to the so-called Cameron mining claims within the Grand Canyon National Park as follows:

The area which is now within the Grand Canyon National Park has been reserved to the Federal Government since February 20, 1893; first, as part of the Grand Canyon forest reserve, and later, since January 11, 1908, all but a minor part of it has been within the Grand Canyon National Monument established by proclamation of the President under the act of June 8, 1906. The inclusion of the area in the forest reserve withdrew it from the operation of the public land laws other than the mineral land law, and its inclusion in the national monument withdrew it from application of the mineral land law. The presidential proclamation creating the national monument, however, provided that the withdrawal of the area for national monument purposes should be subject to all "valid" claims theretofore acquired.

The Grand Canyon National Park as now constituted, with an area of 958 square miles, was established by act of Congress of February 26, 1919. Section 4 of that act protected all valid existing claims and also recognized the right and authority of the county of Coconino over the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail.

Records furnished by the United States Forest Service, which administered the area both as a national forest and a national monument, show that RALPH H. CAMERON and his associates asserted right to at least 81 so-called mining claims in that area, and from other records there appear to be even additional locations claimed by CAMERON. Whether he is still asserting the right to such additional claims can only be determined from county and State records, since it is only when application for patent is made that such cases come before the Interior Department. However, in regard to the claims of record, these appear to include lode, placer, and mill-site claims, claimed under the mining laws. The attached map will show the location of claims of record in this department with relation to existing structures on the south rim and also to the Bright Angel Trail, which is the principal trail leading into the depth of the canyon from the south rim and trails within the canyon. It will be seen that these claims were strategically located with reference to proposed and probable development of the canyon as a tourist attraction.

The Cameron mining claims were first brought to the attention of the department on May 17, 1905, when CAMERON et al. filed application for patent for the Golden Eagle and Cape Horn lode mining claims, which are located on the south rim directly west of the El Tovar Hotel. Adverse claims and protest, alleging, among other things, that the claims were not located upon mineral land, were filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office. On May 24, 1905, CAMERON and his associates also applied for a patent for the Magician and Wizard lode claims and the Alder and Willow mill sites. Protest again was filed against issue of patent. After hearings and rehearings before the Department of the Interior granted the applicant, and after investigation of the claims by mineral inspectors of the General Land Office, the applications for patent were denied and the claims declared invalid and canceled by departmental decisions of February 11, 1909, and November 29, 1911.

After, and notwithstanding, these decisions, CAMERON and his associates asserted exclusive right to possession and enjoyment of the claims as if they were valid, and on September 18, 1915, the United States filed a suit, Equity No. 10, in the United States Court for the District of Arizona, to enjoin CAMERON and others from occupying, using for business purposes, asserting any right to, or interfering with the public use of the lands involved in the Cape Horn claim, and to require removal of buildings and refuse therefrom.

A decree in favor of the United States was affirmed in the circuit court of appeals; thereupon the case was taken to the United States Supreme Court and the decision of the circuit court of appeals was affirmed by that court on April 19, 1920, upholding the right of the Secretary of the Interior in the public interest to inquire into and determine the validity of mining locations, and if found invalid to declare them null and void.

On June 5, 1916, a like suit was instituted in the United States District Court for Arizona covering the Alder and Willow mill sites, located in the Grand Canyon. This suit, known as Equity No. 16, was continued pending the outcome of the first suit. By stipulation a like decree was rendered February 8, 1921, and CAMERON and others were enjoined from the use of said sites and required within 60 days to remove therefrom all buildings, structures, and improvements, and "that this court retain jurisdiction over this cause for such further orders as may appear proper."

These court orders have not been complied with. In spite of the decisions of the department and of the decisions of the courts, various structures are now being maintained by CAMERON and others on the Cape Horn claim and Alder and Willow mill sites, he alleging an agreement with Coconino County regarding the use of the buildings, which he claims to be on the trail right of way. Our records indicate the structures to be off the right of way.

On the attached map the Bright Angel Trail has been outlined in purple while the other trails in the park area covered by the map are shown in red. In this connection the following brief history of the Bright Angel Trail seems pertinent:

It appears from the records that one Peter D. Berry on February 3, 1891, caused to be filed and recorded in the records of Coconino County, Ariz., a certificate and plat showing the location of the trail and designating it as the Bright Angel Toll Road, pursuant to the Territorial statutes relating to the construction of toll roads. Berry (see Duffield v. Ashurst, 100 Pac. R. 820) constructed the trail and operated it as a toll trail. Subsequently he undertook to convey his franchise to RALPH H. CAMERON, who took possession of the trail under the conveyances and collected tolls thereunder. The original franchise ran for 10 years, but under the law was extended for a further period of 5 years, terminating on January 31, 1906.

On February 1, 1906, the board of supervisors of Coconino County, in accordance with the provisions of the Arizona code, entered into contract with one Ferrall for the maintenance of the trail and collection of the tolls thereon in the interest of the county. Ferrall retained possession thereof under contract until April 7, 1907. On March 18, 1907, chapter 55 of the laws enacted by the Twenty-fourth Legislative Assembly of Arizona in 1907 became a law, which provided in effect, among other things, that all rights and franchises theretofore granted under prior laws under which the trail was laid out should be transferable at all times, ratifying and confirming such transfers; furthermore, it gave the former owner of an unexpired franchise a preference right to contracts with the board of supervisors to take charge of toll roads and trails. CAMERON complied with the requirements imposed by statute to avail himself of this last provision. The board of supervisors contracted with him accordingly, and on April 17, 1907, he took possession. In subsequent litigation (Duffield v. Ashurst, supra) the authority of the board of supervisors to make such contracts was upheld. In 1912 CAMERON'S contract expired and Coconino County has since directly maintained the Bright Angel Trail and collected tolls for travel thereon.

In all, 22 Cameron claims have been declared invalid (as indicated on the attached map), while others are now being investigated as to their bona fides by the department.

Respectfully,

ALBERT B. FALL, Secretary.

The case in the United States Supreme Court is Cameron et al. against United States, Two hundred and fifty-second United States, 450. Essential portions of the opinion follow:

Ralph Cameron, Niles J. Cameron, B. A. Cameron, S. D. Pepin, L. L. Ferrall, Appellants, v. The United States of America.

This is a suit by the United States to enjoin RALPH H. CAMERON and others from occupying, using for business purposes, asserting any right to, or interfering with the public use of, a tract of land in Arizona, approximately 1,500 feet long and 600 feet wide, which Cameron is claiming as a lode mining claim, and to require the defendants to remove therefrom certain buildings, filth, and refuse placed thereon in the course of its use by them as a livery stable site and otherwise. In the district court there was a decree for the United States, and this was affirmed by the Circuit Court of Appeals. (250 Fed. Rep. 943.)

The tract is on the southern rim of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado, is immediately adjacent to the railroad terminal and hotel buildings used by visitors to the canyon, and embraces the head of the trail over which visitors descend to and ascend from the bottom of the canyon. Formerly it was public land and open to acquisition under the public land laws. But since February 20, 1893, it has been within a public forest reserve established and continued by proclamations of the President under the acts of March 3, 1891 (c. 561, secs. 24, 26 Stat. 1095, 1103, and June 4, 1897, c. 2, 30 Stat. 34, 36); and since January 11, 1908, all but a minor part of it has been within a monument reserve established by a proclamation of the President under the act of June 8, 1906 (c. 3060, 34 Stat. 225). The forest reserve remained effective after the creation of the monument reserve, but in so far as both embraced the same land the monument reserve became the dominant one. (35 Stat. 2175.) The inclusion of the tract in the forest reserve withdrew it from the operation of the public land laws other than the mineral land law; and the inclusion of the major part of it in the monument reserve withdrew that part from the operation of the mineral land law, but there was a saving clause in respect of any "valid" mining claim theretofore acquired. The United States still has the paramount legal title to the tract, and also has the full beneficial ownership if Cameron's asserted mining claim is not valid.

The defendants insist that the monument reserve should be disregarded on the ground that there was no authority for its creation. To this we can not assent. The act under which the President proceeded empowered him to establish reserves embracing "objects of historic or scientific interest." The Grand Canyon, as stated in his proclamation, "is an object of unusual scientific interest." It is the greatest eroded canyon in the United States, if not in the world, is over a mile in depth, has attracted wide attention among explorers and scientists, affords an unexampled field for geologic study, is regarded as one of the great natural wonders, and annually draws to its borders thousands of visitors.

The defendants also insist that in holding the United States entitled to the relief sought the courts below gave undue effect and weight to decisions of the Secretary of the Interior dealing with CAMERON'S asserted claim and pronouncing it invalid. Rightly to appreciate and dispose of this contention required a further statement.

The claim in question is known as the Cape Horn Lode claim and was located by CAMERON in 1902, after the creation of the forest reserve and before the creation of the monument reserve. To make the claim valid, or to invest the locator with a right to the possession, it was essential that the land be mineral in character and that there be an adequate mineral discovery within the limits of the claim as located (Rev. Stats., Sec. 2320; Cole v. Ralph, ante, 286); and to bring the claim within the saving clause in the withdrawal for the monument reserve the discovery must have preceded the creation of that reserve.

CAMERON applied to the Land Department for the issue to him of a patent for the claim, and similarly sought patents for other claims embracing other portions of the trail into the canyon. A protest was interposed charging that the land was not mineral, that there had been no supporting mineral discoveries, and that the claims were located and used for purposes not contemplated by the mineral land law; and the Secretary of the Interior directed that a hearing be had in the local land office to enable the parties concerned—the protestant, CAMERON, and the Government—to produce evidence bearing on the questions thus presented. (35 L. D. 495; 36 L. D. 66.) After due notice the hearing was had, CAMERON fully participating in it. This was shortly after the creation of the monument reserve. In due course the evidence was laid before the Commissioner of the General Land Office and he concluded therefrom that the claims were not valuable for mining purposes and therefore were invalid. The matter was then taken before the Secretary of the Interior, and that officer rendered a decision in which, after reviewing the evidence, he said:

> "It is not pretended that the applicant has as yet actually disclosed any body of workable ore of commercial value; nor does the evidence reveal such indications and conditions as would warrant the belief or lead to the conclusion that valuable deposits are to be found, save, apparently, in the case of the Magician lode claim. With that possible exception, the probabilities of such deposits occurring are no stronger or more evident at the present time than upon the day the claims were located. The evidence wholly fails to show that there are veins or lodes carrying valuable and workable deposits of gold, silver, or copper, or any other minerals within the limits of the locations. Sufficient time has elapsed since these claims were located for a fair demonstration of their mineral possibilities."

And further:

> "It follows from the foregoing that each of CAMERON'S applications for patent * * * must be rejected and canceled, and it is so ordered.
>
> "It is the further result of the evidence, and the department holds, that the several mining locations, with the apparent exception of the Magician lode claim, do not stand upon such disclosures or indications of valuable mineral in rock in place therein prior to the establishment of the national monument and the withdrawal of the lands therein embraced as to bring them within the saving clause of the Executive order. The right of CAMERON to continue possession or exploration of those claims is hereby denied, and the land covered thereby is declared to be and remain part of the Grand Canyon National Monument as if such locations had not been attempted."

Directions were given for a further hearing respecting the Magician claim, but this is of no moment here.

That decision was adhered to on a motion for review, and in a later decision denying a renewed application by CAMERON for a patent for the claim here in question the Secretary said:

> "As the result of a hearing had after the creation of the national monument, the department expressly found that no discovery of mineral had been made within the limits of the Cape Horn location, and that there was no evidence before the department showing the existence of any valuable deposits or any minerals within the limits of the location. * * * So far as the portion of the claim included within the exterior limits of the national monument is concerned, no discovery which would defeat the said monument can have been made since the date of the previous hearing in this case, nor do I find that one is claimed to have been made since the former decision in any part of the alleged location."

After and notwithstanding these decisions, CAMERON asserted an exclusive right to the possession and enjoyment of the tract, as if the lode claim were valid, and he and his codefendants, who were acting for or under him, continued to occupy and use the ground for livery and other business purposes, and in that and other ways obstructed its use by the public as a part of the reserves. In this situation and to put an end to what the Government deemed a continuing trespass, purpresture, and public nuisance, the present suit was brought.

The courts below ruled that the decisions of the Secretary of the Interior should be taken as conclusively determining the nonmineral character of the land and the absence of an adequate mineral discovery, and also as showing that the matter before the Secretary was not merely the application for a patent but also the status of the claim—whether it was valid or was wanting in essential elements of validity, and whether it entitled CAMERON to the use of the land as against the public and the Government. As before stated, the defendants complain of that ruling. The objections urged against it are: First, that the Secretary's decisions show that he proceeded upon a misconception of what under law constitutes an adequate mineral discovery and, second, that although the Secretary had ample authority to determine whether CAMERON was entitled to a patent, he was without authority to determine the character of the land or the question of discovery or to pronounce the claim invalid.

As to the first objection little need be said. A reading of each decision in its entirety and not merely the excerpts to which the defendants invite attention makes it plain that the Secretary proceeded upon the theory that to support a mining location the discovery should be such as would justify a person of ordinary prudence in the further expenditure of his time and means in an effort to develop a paying mine. That is not a novel or mistaken test but is one which the Land Department long has applied and this court has approved. (Chrisman v. Miller, 197 U. S. 313, 322.)

The second objection rests on the naked proposition that the Secretary was without power to determine whether the asserted lode claim, under which Cameron was occupying and using a part of the reserves to the exclusion of the public and the reserve officers, was a valid claim. We say "naked proposition" because it is not objected that CAMERON did not have a full and fair hearing, or that any fraud was practiced against him, but only that the Secretary was without any power of decision in the matter. In our opinion the proposition is not tenable.

* * * * * * *

The argument is advanced that the department necessarily is without authority to pronounce a mining location invalid, because it has within itself no means of executing its decision, such as dispossessing the locator. But this is not a proper test of the existence of the authority, for the department is without the means of executing most of its decisions in the sense suggested. When it issues a patent it has no means of putting the grantee in possession, and yet its authority to issue patents is beyond question. When it awards a tract to one of two rival homestead claimants it has no means of putting the successful one in possession or the other one out, and yet its authority to determine which has the better claim is settled by repeated decisions of this court. And a similar situation exists in respect of most of the claims or controversies on which the department must pass in regular course. Its province is that of determining questions of fact and right under the public land laws, of recognizing or disapproving claims according to their merits, and of granting or refusing patents as the law may give sanction for the one or the other. When there is occasion to enforce its decisions in the sense suggested, this is done through suits instituted by the successful claimants or by the Government, as the one or the other may have the requisite interest.

Whether the tract covered by CAMERON'S location was mineral and whether there had been the requisite discovery were questions of fact, the decision of which by the Secretary of the Interior was conclusive in the absence of fraud or imposition, and none was claimed. (Catholic Bishop of Nesqually v. Gibbon, supra; Burfenning v. Chicago, St. Paul, etc., Railway Co., 163 U. S. 321, 323.) Accepting the Secretary's findings that the tract was not mineral and that there had been no discovery, it is plain that the location was invalid, as was declared by the Secretary and held by the courts below.

Of other complaints made by the defendants, it suffices to say that, in our opinion, the record shows that the Government was entitled to the relief sought and awarded.

I call your attention to the map which I have placed in front of the desk here. Here is a map of the Grand Canyon, and here, marked in red, are the original 21 claims that have been pronounced worthless by the Supreme Court of the United States. Originally they restricted all development here upon the south rim itself, and here they crossed the Bright Angel Trail. Here is Indian Gardens that I will speak of later on in my remarks, a lovely place, where springs arise and cottonwood trees grow. It is a delightful place. If you have not been accustomed to riding, or even if you have been, by the time you have made the descent from the rim to Indian Gardens you will want to get off the mule to rest a little while and get some cool water to drink and a chance to eat your lunch in comfort. But all these purposes are frustrated because, in the face of a decision of the United States Supreme Court, CAMERON still occupies a strategic point here on the Bright Angel Trail. These colored spaces on the map [indicating] represent 28 claims that I shall refer to which have been pronounced worthless, and there is no doubt as to their invalidity. Those areas in purple represent a general smattering of platinum claims located in 1919 after the law had precisely provided that no claim could possibly be filed. The river is running through here, and wherever there could be a trail or a comfort station or a rest booth provided these invalid claims, these makeshift claims, were in the way of public development.

The following Cameron claims have been declared invalid:

By departmental decisions of February 11, 1909, and November 29, 1911: Golden Eagle, Cape Horn, Wizard, Alder mill site, and Willow mill site.

By General Land Office decision, November 17, 1915: Magician.

By General Land Office decision, May 12, 1919, and departmental decisions June 29 and September 15, 1920.

Closed by General Land Office, September 22, 1920: Banjo, Millionaire, Sentinel Treasure, Peg Leg, Hill Top, Sunflower, Limestone, Goldenola, Ida May, Buttinsky, Cheyenne, Dakotah, Bannock, Apache, Folly, Hermit, and Gorge.

In June, 1921, the service requested the General Land Office to have caused an investigation of the remaining mining claims of record possession of which was being asserted by CAMERON and associates to determine whether they were bona fide. This investigation was made in April, 1922, and report made to the General Land Office stated that the 28 claims investigated were the only Cameron claims in good standing in the records of Coconino County, Ariz. These 28 claims were reported to be nonmineral in character and that no valid discovery of placer mineral had been made. Under date of August 30, 1922, the Commissioner of the General Land Office instructed the register and receiver of Phoenix, Ariz., to enter adverse proceedings against the claimants. In March, 1923, the register and receiver advised the Commissioner of the General Land Office that notice of adverse proceedings had been mailed to the claimants, but the date of hearing has not been set.

Answer was filed and hearing was set for February 29, 1924, at Flagstaff, but on request of Mr. CAMERON for postponement a continuance was granted until after adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Mineral Inspector Mackel, who investigated and reported on the above-mentioned 28 claims, also reported that associates of CAMERON had located 55 placer claims of 160 acres each January 10, 11, 12, 1919, covering ground previously covered by claim canceled by the department, and also ground within the national monument and national park reservations. These claims are not valid, as the national monument withdrawal of January 11, 1908, withdrew the land from application of the mineral land law. Inspector Mackel concluding his report stated: "These alleged locators under the mining law could be treated as trespassers and evicted as such. This is a point of law to be construed by the proper authority. In any event, there is no question but what these alleged locations are not mineral in character and no valid discovery of placer mineral has been made."

Under date of February 2, 1924, I called the Cameron case to the attention of the Secretary of the Interior in the following letter:

FEBRUARY 2, 1924.

Hon. HUBERT WORK,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: With reference to the rights asserted by RALPH CAMERON in certain lands within the Grand Canyon National Park, I have noted the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States affirming the decree in favor of the Government dispossessing CAMERON of certain lands claimed by him that are highly essential to the proper development of the Grand Canyon National Park. Being under the impression that the matter of actual dispossession of CAMERON was pending in the Department of Justice, I addressed an inquiry under date of January 18 to the Attorney General asking what action had been taken by that department. In reply I have a letter under date of January 25 from the Attorney General in which he recites the status of the litigation and then states:

> "Since the entry of these decrees no further action has been taken by this department, nor has any further request been received from the Interior Department for action by us. I presume that if any additional proceedings by this department are desired request therefor will be made by the Secretary of the Interior, under whose supervision the Grand Canyon Park is administered."

I will be glad to be advised as to the attitude of your department with reference to the unlawful retention of these lands by Mr. CAMERON in the face of final action of the highest court, and is it to be expected that your office will call upon the Department of Justice to proceed in the matter? I am, yours sincerely,

LOUIS C. CRAMTON.

The Secretary of the Interior, Doctor Work, is taking a highly commendable interest in the case and, the matter being thus brought to his attention, asked Mr. CAMERON "and his associates to vacate the Cape Horn claim, Alder and Willow mill sites, and the 55 placer claims located in 1919, which have no standing, as they were located after the national monument withdrawal of 1908." This not proving effective, he has requested the Attorney General to instruct the United States district attorney "to take appropriate action to protect the interests of the United States and the public in the Grand Canyon National Park."

I have the following from Secretary Work:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 1, 1924.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMTON: Referring to your letter of February 12, 1924, relative to alleged mining claims in the Grand Canyon National Park, I inclose, for your information, copy of my letter of February 28, 1924, to the Attorney General of the United States with relation thereto.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

(Inclosure.)

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 28, 1924.

The honorable the ATTORNEY GENERAL.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: April 19, 1923, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered decision (252 U. S. 450) in favor of the United States in a suit to enjoin RALPH CAMERON and others from occupying, using for business purposes, asserting any right to, or interfering with the public use of a tract 1,500 feet by 600 feet, known as the Cape Horn mining claim, located on the rim of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado in Arizona, and to require the defendants to remove therefrom certain buildings and refuse. By stipulation like decree was rendered February 8, 1921, by the United States District Court for the District of Arizona, affecting the Alder mill site and the Willow mill site, located on the canyon floor, and CAMERON and others were enjoined from use of said tracts and were required within 60 days to remove therefrom all buildings, structures, and improvements, and "that this court retain jurisdiction over this cause for such further orders as may appear proper."

There are now located on the claims referred to the following structures: Cape Horn claim, a small house painted green, called green house in correspondence; a two-story building occupied by post office; garage; small cottage; and postmaster's residence. On the Alder and Willow mill sites, a long storehouse occupied by a caretaker of the Bright Angel Trail, ownership of which is now in Coconino County; the stone shell of a two-story structure; and 10 to 12 frames for small shelter cabins for campers.

According to an opinion of the solicitor of this department, it would appear that any and all claims or rights of CAMERON and the other defendants in the suits mentioned as to the tracts in controversy were adjudicated and denied, and they were required to vacate and remove the structures therefrom. With regard to the storehouse occupied by the caretaker the Department of the Interior is very glad to have the county of Coconino continue to use it under annual permit. The department is also willing to have remain under permit to the Post Office Department, as a matter of cooperation with that department the building housing the post office, as well as the postmaster's residence and garage. A copy of the solicitor's opinion is inclosed for your information.

From a report made by mineral examiners of the General Land Office of this department in 1922 it has been further ascertained, by reference to local county records, that in January, 1919, G. H. Stetson, W. N. Fowler, H. N. Williams, E. E. Hopkins, H. B. Stetson, A. C. McClure, T. T. Potter, and H. N. Niles, associates of CAMERON, located about 55 placer claims of 160 acres each on the floor of the Grand Canyon, close to and adjoining locations made by R. H. CAMERON prior to January 11, 1908, the date of the establishment by presidential proclamation of the Grand Canyon National Monument, and covering claims previously canceled by departmental decision and also other areas covered in national park and national monument withdrawals. As will be noted from the inclosed copy of the proclamation establishing the Grand Canyon National Monument, it "reserved from appropriation and use of all kinds under all of the public land laws, subject to all prior adverse claims," the area within the national monument boundaries. The Grand Canyon National Park was established February 26, 1919, and the act reads that "whenever consistent with the primary purposes of said park, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, under general regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the prospecting, development, and utilization of the mineral resources of said park upon such terms and for specific periods, or otherwise, as he may deem to be for the best interest of the United States." I attach copy of the act for your information. The regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior for the administration of the Grand Canyon National Park covering prospecting and mining prescribe, and have consistently prescribed, that "the location of mining claims on the Government land in the park is permitted only with the prior approval of the Secretary of the Interior." No application from these alleged locators has been received by the department.

As the Grand Canyon Monument withdrawal of January 11, 1908, withdrew the area from the operation of the mineral land law, any locations since that date are not valid. Therefore these claims have no standing and these alleged locators can not, it appears to me, be considered and treated otherwise than as trespassers, and evicted as such. As to these matters the Department of the Interior requests that the United States district attorney be instructed by you to take appropriate action to protect the interest of the United States and the public in the Grand Canyon National Park.

Very truly yours, HUBERT WORK.

The way these private encroachments on the national reserve interfere with the public use and enjoyment of the park was entertainingly set forth by Charles E. Van Loan in "John Jones—Goat" in the Saturday Evening Post of June 3, 1916. The Grand Canyon was then a national monument under the Forest Service, but there was no love for the "Cameron claims" on the part of the public. Let Van Loan tell you about it for you are each a John Jones, though I may only quote here a small portion:

Now Yavapai Point is distant something like a mile and a half from the hotel—a mile and a half of surpassing panorama, overlooking some of the most beautiful "temples" and peaks in the canyon; but John Jones does not enjoy his walk. There is no trail along the rim, and to reach Yavapai Point he must walk on razor-edged fragments of porous limestone, which hurt his feet and ruin his light shoes. His clothing suffers from contact with scrub pine and cat-claw acacia, and it does not take John Jones long to make up his mind that Yavapai Point, however beautiful, is not worth while. He returns, fuming, and encounters a young man in the uniform of a forest ranger.

"Say, why isn't there a trail along this rim?" asks Jones.

He then learns that the building of a cinder path to Yavapai Point would be a very simple matter but for the fact that every inch of the rim eastward is covered by five mining claims—the Buttinski, Goldenola, Sunflower, Limestone, and Hill Top—the last resting squarely on Yavapai Point itself.

"Well, what do you think of that?" says John Jones.

Being interested in mining claims, he looks up the Buttinski, for instance, and discovers that the same scientific gentlemen, Government experts, testified that the following was their best assay on the Buttinski:

Gold, trace; copper, trace; silver, none; platinum, none.

"Well," says John Jones, "it looks to a simple tourist as if the rim of the canyon were pretty well sewed up along here. I guess I'll have to try something else."

He returns to the hotel and from the iron railing he spies a tiny patch of vivid green, lying like an emerald, 3,000 feet below.

"What's that?" asks John Jones.

He is told that he is looking at Indian Gardens, possibly called so because there are no Indians there.

"It looks good to me!" says John Jones. "How do you get there?"

John Jones rents a sorrowful, taciturn mule and signs articles for a trip down the Bright Angel Trail—without a doubt the most traveled mountain thoroughfare of its kind in the world. The guides call it a boulevard; what John Jones calls it, as his mule swings out over precipices, is of no consequence; but, at any rate, he finally arrives at Indian Gardens, the resting place for every person ascending or descending the Bright Angel Tail.

Does John Jones find shelter and accommodations at Indian Gardens? He does not. He piles off his mule and hunts for shade, for it is usually quite warm at Indian Gardens, no matter what the weather conditions on the rim. Not the slightest provision is made for the weary, saddle-galled tourist, with the exception of two filthy, frame comfort stations. John Jones goes to the guide with fire in his eye.

"See here! Why is not this place cleaned up? It is an outrage to bring people into a nest of this kind!"

The guide admits it, and tells a story of mill sites and lode and placer claims, blanketing the entire locality.

"The company has got an application in to build a resthouse here to take care of the folks who make the trail trips," says the guide, "but it is all tied up by law some way or other. Can not put up any kind of a building; can not clean out the ones that is here. Why, lode claims have been filed right on top of mill-site claims; and down in one corner there is a placer claim that sort of overlaps the whole shebang!"

"But something ought to be done! This place in insanitary."

"Shore it is; but nobody can do anything about it till they git done goin' to law."

And so, though there is now on file with the forest service an application for a "special-use permit" to erect a clean, comfortable, and sanitary resthouse at Indian Gardens—a thing which is an absolute necessity—all the John Joneses to come must put up with the wretched and insanitary arrangements of the present, and wait for the claim question to settle itself somehow.

John Jones thinks that, as so many people are inconvenienced every year by this dog-in-the-manger attitude, there must be some mineral at Indian Gardens very well worth holding onto; so he looks up the court testimony on the Banjo claim, one of those numerous legal plasters thereabouts. This is what he learns: Gold, unweighable; copper, none; silver, unweighable; platinum, none.

Now the administration of the park is in the National Park Service, and the Cameron claims at Indian Gardens have been denied by the highest court in the land, but a representative of RALPH CAMERON still holds possession of disreputable-looking tents and shanties in this oasis where should be rest for the weary and travel sore.

Neat toilets are greatly needed, but a lawless squatter prevents. The water that comes babbling down from pure springs above is defiled from old "Cameron claim" privy tanks, near which the brook flows.

That the hostility to any improvement or progress is active and real you may judge from this recent telegram:

GRAND CANYON, ARIZ.,
February 12, 1924, 11.22.

The DIRECTOR NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, D. C.:

On Saturday at a point approximately 100 yards below the red house formerly used by Kolb brothers on Indian Creek in the canyon, and below Indian Gardens, was installed by my permission a water weir and gauge for measuring the flow of Indian Creek by engineers Santa Fe Railroad on a water-procuring plan.

I may say that one of the difficulties in administering the Grand Canyon National Park is the absence of water, and it must be hauled in by railroad trains.

To-day we find that this weir and water gauge has been destroyed by an explosion placed and set off by persons unknown, but presumably the caretaker at Indian Gardens. This man had stated that he would destroy the weir and gauge. Wire instructions.

J. R. EAKIN.

The Harvey Co. a few years ago brought in 60 mule loads of material from the rim of the river at the end of the Bright Angel Trail to erect a comfort station. An injunction forced them to carry it all out again. Women in whom modesty has restrained obedience to demands of nature have suffered permanent and serious injury thereby.

The imminent importance of immediate action is emphasized by the following that comes to me to-day:

I see I have not brought with me certain documents, but I can give you their effect. There came in, under date of February 25, a letter from the authorities in charge of the Grand Canyon National Park, in which it was stated that a recent official examination had shown that the water that is available for the use of the tourists at the lunch place below Indian Gardens has typhoid bacilli to the extent of from 800 to 1,500 per cubic centimeter. Now, that is going to be news for my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER], because he and I, about a year ago, drank several centimeters of that water, and I do not know how many thousands of typhoid germs, and every tourist who has passed there in the last year has been drinking that impure, menacing water, and even after it has been called to the attention of the trespassers.

There is a spring a little above that, which is now dominated by RALPH CAMERON'S caretaker, and when this situation was discovered a request was made of that caretaker that use of the water from the spring by tourists be permitted. It was promised; but a telegram that came to the National Park Service last Saturday afternoon not only carried the news that the public was being prevented from using the pure water from the spring, and were forced to use the other water, but that the notice which had been put up to give the public warning of the dangerous character of the water at the lunch station had been torn down by Mr. CAMERON'S caretaker.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: The gentleman stated a moment ago that the Supreme Court of the United States had held against Mr. CAMERON and his claims. Has not the Supreme Court any power to enforce its decree in that matter, and when may we expect the Supreme Court to enforce its decree?

Mr. CRAMTON. A defense was raised in the case, and I intend to put in my remarks some portions of the decision of the Supreme Court. Mr. CAMERON and his associates in that case raised the issue that because the Interior Department had no way of enforcing its remedy its decisions did not cut any figure; the Supreme Court held that did not follow, but that the rights would be defined and then action could be maintained in court to make the decision effective.

Now, there have been—for obvious reasons which I can not emphasize because of parliamentary restrictions—from time to time delays in this matter, but the correspondence I am putting in the RECORD will show that very promptly after the situation was brought to the attention of the present Secretary of the Interior, Doctor Work, he went into it, and he has sent a request to the Attorney General that the rights of the Government there be protected and I am hoping they will be protected.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Does the gentleman think they will be protected?

Mr. CRAMTON. I believe they will be.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I hope so.

Mr. CRAMTON. I now have the papers to which I referred and insert them here:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 1, 1924.

Hon. L. C. CRAMTON,
United States House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CRAMTON: You have requested that there be sent to you papers bearing on any recent development in Grand Canyon National Park having relation to the necessity for acquiring the Bright Angel Trail, provision for which was made in the Interior Department appropriation bill while it was being considered on the floor of the House of Representatives.

In compliance with your request I am attaching hereto a letter from the Superintendent of Grand Canyon National Park, dated February 25, in reference to pollution of water required for drinking purposes by people using the Bright Angel Trail, and two telegrams from the superintendent to the Director of the National Park Service relating to the action taken by parties unknown in destroying a weir and gauging station and in tearing down signs warning people not to use polluted water.

Very truly yours,

HUBERT WORK.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
GRAND CANYON NATIONAL PARK,
Grand Canyon, Ariz., February 25, 1924.

OFFICE OF THE SUPERINTENDENT,
DIRECTOR NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On the morning of February 23, Mr. Shirley, of the Transportation Co., reported that samples of water taken at the lunching station on Indian Garden Creek had been analyzed by the Santa Fe Hospital at Los Angeles and were found to contain large numbers of typhoid germs, and that he had been notified the water was dangerous. Samples were also taken from two springs approximately one-fourth mile above the lunching station and were found to be pure. The caretaker of Indian Gardens was on the rim and, at my suggestion, Mr. Shirley asked for permission to lay a pipe line from the spring to the lunching station. The caretaker said he would have to wire Mr. CAMERON before granting permission, which he immediately did. To date he has not received a reply. In the meantime he has given permission for water to be taken from the spring and carried to the lunching station, but will not permit luncheon to be taken at the spring.

The analysis of samples follow: One thousand four hundred and ninety colonies of typhoid per 1 c. c. water incubated at 20° C., 810 colonies of typhoid per 1 c. c. water incubated at 37° C.

In order to make certain that above analyses are correct, we are sending samples to the State authorities with the request that they report their findings by wire, and we will in turn wire you.

Attached hereto you will find rough sketch of layout at Indian Gardens. In our opinion contamination of stream comes from old toilets built by Clarence Spaulding about 1909 for use of CAMERON'S tent colony. These toilets were also used by the public until about two years ago, when the caretaker destroyed them, but, we are informed, did not fill the pits.

Guides conducting parties will see that no impure water is used. Signs are being posted to warn others. The water will, however, be a constant menace, and always will be, as long as this property is privately controlled.

Very truly yours,

J. R. EAKIN, Superintendent.

GRAND CANYON, ARIZ., March 1, 1924.

The DIRECTOR NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, D. C.:

Sign warning against danger of water at lunch station Indian Gardens torn down by caretaker. Refuses to permit use of water at spring. Situation impossible; something must be done. Have not received analysis from State.

J. R. EAKIN, Superintendent.

Mr. CRAMTON. The following memorandum from the department gives the latest status of this matter:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
March 1, 1924.

I phoned Mr. CAMERON at 4.30 to-day, reading him the attached telegram.

He advised that he wanted to do everything possible to cooperate and would wire the custodian of the property to allow them to go ahead and use the water in whatever way they saw fit.

E. K. BURLEW,
Administrative Assistant.

Fifteen hundred colonies of typhoid per cubic centimeter of water, and I drank several cubic centimeters of that water last March, and thousands of visitors to the parks have monthly since. And now that it is proven that this menace to public health exists, CAMERON'S "caretaker refuses to permit use of water at spring, and sign warning against danger of water at lunch station torn down by caretaker."

Truly, the situation is impossible and something must be done. While the Attorney General proceeds to oust CAMERON, let Congress provide for elimination of private ownership of the trail. Let the farce of 20 years be ended and public interests no longer be mocked by private interests acting above the law.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sorry I have not heard all of the gentleman's address. I came in late and then was called out. But I want to know this: What was the basis of the claims which the gentleman from Michigan has been denouncing?

Mr. CRAMTON. They were lode, mill-site, and placer claims.

Mr. HASTINGS. And all have been denied by the Supreme Court, at least all those which have been taken to the Supreme Court?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. And, as was pointed out clearly in the story of Mr. Van Loan in the Saturday Evening Post of seven years ago, the tests made showed that the working of these different claims showed no minerals. There was one claim called the Millionaire, right up on the rim of the canyon, and in that claim there was of gold an amount unweighable, of silver an amount unweighable, of platinum none, and of copper none. So it runs through all of these claims. They were worked not with the expectation of ever getting any minerals but through the use of the law as a subterfuge to permit private interests to come in and take the strategic points so that the park never could be developed except under the permission and regulation of private interests.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I want to say to the gentleman that I am heartily in accord with his statement here; and if the Secretary of the Interior has not the power to enforce his rulings, we ought to give him that power immediately. But let me ask this question: Does the gentleman say that these gentlemen who have these claims are holding up the Government and preventing people from going through the park and want the Government to pay for the right of going over this property?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am frank to say—although it is not for me to figure out what are their motives—that I believe that the Cameron interests recognize that the issue has gone against them and that their hope of getting anything for themselves is in the past, but there is that dog-in-the-manger attitude that still exists; but I am confident that the proceedings set in motion by the Secretary of the Interior will eliminate CAMERON and his associates. The purpose of the amendment which Mr. CARTER, Mr. HAYDEN, and myself have been promoting is to eliminate the private ownership of the trail which comes down and which affords a basis for such complications.

I may say that I understand Mr. CAMERON makes some claim that some of the buildings he maintains are on the trail, and that he has some rights derived from that fact, although that claim is disputed by the Park Service.

Mr. WINTER. How many of these claims were actually involved and before the court in the Cameron case?

Mr. CRAMTON. That will be set forth clearly in my remarks. I think 21 of them were affected by that decision.

Mr. WINTER. Were they down in the canyon or up on the rim?

Mr. CRAMTON. The ones I indicate here—the Millionaire and some others—were upon the rim, but those called the Alder and Willow claims were down at Indian Gardens as well, but that is specifically set out in the papers I insert.

Mr. WINTER. Did not the Supreme Court in the Cameron case direct the method by which the decision of the Secretary of the Interior could be enforced through the Department of Justice?

Mr. CRAMTON. The Supreme Court said the procedure to enforce the decision would be "done through suits instituted by the successful claimants or by the Government."

Mr. WINTER. And is not the action through the Department of Justice one of ejectment, based on the decision of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CRAMTON. The action, I suppose, is one based upon the decision of the Secretary of the Interior as affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. WINTER. Yes; and is it in the procedure of the court case of ejectment that these delays are now occurring?

Mr. CRAMTON. No. The trouble has been that the decision was in 1920 and a sister case in 1921 which was decided on the basis of the first one, and we are just now getting action in the Interior Department; but I may say that very promptly after the matter was called to the attention of the present Secretary of the Interior things commenced to move.

Mr. WINTER. And now a portion of these claims have still to go through the same procedure to remove them legally; is that true?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; these other claims are in a different situation. The first claims were entered when there was a right to enter a mining claim before the Territory was included in any kind of a monument or park. The others have been attempts to enter since the law has expressly forbidden any entry.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CARTER. The matter that is now before the Congress is that subsequent to, and in pursuance of, that meeting which the gentleman spoke of at the El Tovar Hotel there was placed in an appropriation bill $100,000 for the purchase of this trail now owned by Coconino County, the money to be used by the county for roads approaching the park.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. That was adopted by the House and has now been stricken out by the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; that is the issue that is pending, and it is my hope that at the same time that the rights against CAMERON are being maintained in the courts by the Attorney General, Congress will make available the money that goes directly for the improvement of an approach road which I think we ought to improve ourselves, and, coincident with that, the county agrees to surrender its right in this private toll, and we eliminate all these private interests that endanger the administration of the park.

I thank you. [Applause.]

RICHARD W. O'NEIL, ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to introduce to the Members of the House Richard W. O'Neil, One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry, one of the congressional medal of honor men, named by Governor Smith, of New York, as New York's outstanding hero in the World War, who is the national sergeant at arms of the Disabled American Veterans. [Applause.]

CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The order of business to-day is the Consent Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill on the calendar.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MINNESOTA.

The first bill on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2876) to provide for the payment of claims of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota for back annuities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what these claims are. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to pay out of any moneys belonging to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota such amounts as he may find due any persons of Chippewa blood whose names may have been erroneously omitted or stricken from the Chippewa annuity rolls.

Mr. SNYDER. In the past great many years there have been found about 400 Chippewa Indians who were left off the roll originally erroneously, and others that have come into existence that rightfully belong on the rolls and have been put on the rolls, but there have been certain annuity payments, known as per capita payments, paid to all the other Chippewas, but under existing law in no way could these per capita payments be paid to these 400, about, that have been enrolled since the original enrollment. So we are asking now for legislation to permit the Secretary of the Interior to authorize and pay the per capita payments to these men that have already been paid to the others.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. When a bill is stricken from the Consent Calendar does it go to the foot of the calendar?

The SPEAKER. It goes to the foot of the calendar, unless there is a special agreement that it shall not; but generally—and the Chair thinks as to these bills—there was an agreement that they should be passed without prejudice, and in such cases, they keep their places on the calendar.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. No; I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum. It is apparent that a quorum is not present.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Abernethy	Davey	McDuffie	Sinclair

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-five Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the first bill on the calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2876) to provide for the payment of claim of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota for back annuities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any moneys belonging to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, such amounts as he may find due any persons of Chippewa blood whose names may have been erroneously omitted or stricken from the Chippewa annuity rolls, or who have been or may hereafter be found entitled to enrollment for annuity payments authorized by section 7 of the act of Congress approved January 14, 1889 (25 Stat. L. p. 642): Provided, That any moneys found due and paid to any Indian under the provisions of this act shall not be subject to any lien or claim of attorneys or other parties.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment. On page 1, line 6, after the word "persons," strike out "of Chippewa blood."

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNYDER as a committee amendment: Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "of Chippewa blood."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LAC COURTE OREILLE INDIAN RESERVATION, WIS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2883) to validate certain allotments of land made to Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Indian Reservation in Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any allotments of land to Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Indian Reservation in Wisconsin, and the restricted fee patents issued therefor, under the provisions of article 3 of the treaty of September 30, 1854 (10 Stat. L. p. 1109), which are in conflict with the provisions of the treaty because of the fact that the allottee was under 21 years of age and not the head of a family when allotted, or because the allottee was a female and married but not the head of a family when allotted, be, and the same are hereby, validated.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LAC DU FLAMBEAU BAND OF LAKE SUPERIOR CHIPPEWAS, WISCONSIN.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3684) for the enrollment and allotment of members of the Lac du Flambeau Band of Lake Superior Chippewas, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I think the bill is sufficiently important for the chairman to make some explanation of it.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, in the last Congress this bill was before the House and would have been considered at that time, except that the question was raised as to whether or not it affected any existing treaties. I am now able to state that there are no treaties with the Indians in relation to this matter. It has to do with certain Indians who have been allotted within the last 25 or 30 years, and who, at that time, had no legal status for allotments. There has been no law up to this time which would permit the department to legally allot these Indians who have been in possession of the allotments for the last 20 or 30 years. They were not allotted, originally, because they were under 21 years of age and not heads of families. Perhaps there was a female Indian who was not 21 and could not be allotted but who has since become married. All this bill purports to do at this time is to give the Secretary of the Interior the right to legally allot these Indians who should have been allotted in the beginning. There are about 50 people involved in this matter.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to add to the existing rolls of the Lac du Flambeau Band of Chippewa Indians the names of all persons legally entitled to enrollment born prior to the approval of this act, such roll to constitute the final roll of the Lac du Flambeau Band. In the preparation of this roll the said Secretary shall be assisted by a committee of two members of the said band duly appointed at a general council of the Lac du Flambeau Band called for that purpose. As soon as practicable after the approval of the roll the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments of land within the Lac du Flambeau Indian Reservation to be made to the members of the band whose names appear on said additional roll (exclusive of the merchantable timber on such land) in conformity with the provisions of the general allotment act of February 8, 1887 (24th Stats. L. p. 388), as amended, the trust patents to said allotments to contain the usual 25-year restriction clause as to alienation and taxation: Provided, That if there is not sufficient unappropriated land on the reservation to give each member the full acreage to which he or she is entitled, the Secretary of the Interior may prorate the lands as nearly as practicable among the members so enrolled. The patents for the allotments made hereunder shall issue to the allottees as early as practicable after the merchantable timber thereon has been removed, and the right is hereby reserved to the United States to cut and market the merchantable timber on the lands so allotted, the proceeds to be disposed of as herein provided. When the merchantable timber has been cut from the lands so allotted the title to such timber as remains on said lands shall thereupon pass to the respective allottees: Provided further, That the land allotted or reserved hereunder shall be subject to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country until otherwise provided by Congress.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to sell the merchantable timber on the lands allotted under the provisions of this act, at the current market value at the time the sale is made, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the net proceeds derived therefrom, together with any undistributed proceeds derived from the sale of timber heretofore cut and sold from such lands, shall be distributed per capita and paid to the members of the band enrolled under the provisions of this act where such members are or may hereafter be adjudged by the Secretary of the Interior to be competent to manage their own affairs and care for their own business; and in cases where members have not been adjudged competent by the Secretary of the Interior, their shares shall be deposited to their individual credit as individual Indian moneys are now deposited and paid to them or used for their benefit under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That of the amount now on deposit and hereafter derived from the sale of tribal timber, at least $50,000 shall be distributed among the members enrolled under the provisions of this act as early as practicable after the approval of the roll as herein provided.

SEC. 3. That there be reserved from allotment or other disposition the following lands: For the village of Lac du Flambeau the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter and lots 3 and 4 of section 5 and lots 3 and 4 of section 8, township 40 north, range 5 east; for the Indian village lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of section 1, lots 1 and 7 of section 2, and lots 1, 2, and 3 of section 12, township 40 north, range 4 east; and for the school and agency farm the unappropriated land in sections 6 and 7, township 40 north, range 5 east, that in the east half of section 31, and that in the west half of section 32, township 41 north, range 5 east.

SEC. 4. That the sum of $5,000, or as much thereof as may be needed, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the purpose of preparing a tribal roll in accordance with the provisions of this act and also for the surveys and other expenses necessary in making the allotments herein authorized.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF LANDS NO LONGER NEEDED FOR ADMINISTRATIVE PURPOSES.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4803) to authorize the sale of land and plants not longer needed for Indian administrative or allotment purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized in his discretion to sell and convey by deed or patent, under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, at not less than their appraised value, nonreservation Government tracts or plants or tribal administrative plants or reserves, or parts thereof, not longer needed for Indian administrative or allotment purposes, and small unallotted tracts not exceeding 40 acres, where a sale will serve the tribal interests. All sales made under this act shall be at public auction, to the highest and best bidder.

And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized where a tract to be disposed of under this or any other act authorizing the disposition of tribal lands requires survey as basis for a deed or patent, to accept from the grantee, in addition to the purchase price, an amount sufficient to cover the survey costs.

The net proceeds of sale of any tribal site, plant, or tract shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indians owning the same, to be disposed of for their benefit in accordance with existing law; and the net proceeds of sales of Government-owned nontribal plants or lands shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "thereof" insert the following: "not exceeding 40 acres in area and not exceeding $2,000 in value."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this title goes to the grantees in fee?

Mr. SNYDER. I will say to the gentleman that in the management of Indian affairs, for a great many years, there has been created here and there a little tract of land, it may be an acre or two, or five or ten acres, in a corner, perhaps, of a schoolhouse lot which has become unnecessary for future use.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am asking whether the title goes in fee without any restriction?

Mr. SNYDER. My understanding of this is that it gives the Secretary of the Interior the right to sell or dispose of any plot of land not exceeding 40 acres, or in value not over $2,000, or property to that extent. We might take an old schoolhouse, for example.

Mr. CARTER. This is a fee title, given, as I understand it, to property not longer needed for use.

Mr. SNYDER. That is it exactly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It gives it in fee to any person?

Mr. CARTER. Yes. This is sold to bring the funds into the Treasury or into the Indian fund.

Mr. SNYDER. Heretofore special legislation has had to be enacted for the sale of every one of those little pieces, and we decided, there being so many of them, that we would give them the right to sell these pieces with a limitation up to 40 acres in area and $2,000 in value, and let them sell them in the future.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman not go a little too far in his committee amendment? It seems to me that that language is a little confusing.

Mr. SNYDER. "Not exceeding 40 acres in area and not exceeding $2,000 in price."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I read from the bill:

not longer needed for Indian administrative or allotment purposes, and small unallotted tracts not exceeding 40 acres.

Why is that repeated?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not know that there is any necessity for it. The bill was carefully considered by the committee and reported unanimously.

Mr. CARTER. That would be a different class of land from that recited in the first part of the bill. The first part of the bill recites, if the gentleman from New York will permit me——

Mr. SNYDER. Certainly.

nonreservation Government tracts or plants or tribal administrative plants or reserves, or parts thereof, not exceeding 40 acres in area and not exceeding $2,000 in value, not longer needed for Indian administrative or allotment purposes.

That would not be embraced in the language carried before the amendment. The unallotted tract is the land that has not been used by the Government but remnants left after allotments have been made to the Indians, which have not been disposed of and which have not been used. There ought to be some provision for the sale of these, I think.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What about the word "small"?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, if necessary, that could be stricken out. It does not mean anything particularly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana without objection withdraws the pro forma amendment. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LAKE ANDES, S. DAK.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4161), authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to acquire necessary rights of way across private lands, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, needed in constructing a spillway and drainage ditch to lower and maintain the level of Lake Andes, in South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized, in order to carry out the provisions of an act approved September 21, 1922 (42 Stat. p. 990), entitled "An act providing for the construction of a spillway and drainage ditch to lower and maintain the level of Lake Andes, S. D.," to acquire necessary rights of way across private lands by purchase or condemnation under judicial process, and not to exceed $5,000 of the money heretofore appropriated for the construction of this project shall be available for such purpose.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT JUDGES FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 661), authorizing the President to appoint two additional circuit judges for the eighth circuit.

The SPEAKER. This is the first bill that has come up under the new rule which provides that where a bill is objected to by one person and is reached again on the calendar, three objections are then required to strike it from the calendar. This is a novel question and subject to the will of the House, but the Chair is disposed to think that the best way would be for the Chair to ask any individuals who object to rise. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STENGLE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUCE. May I ask if under this situation there is to be opportunity to ask that the objections be withheld?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The Chair thinks that could be done.

Mr. LUCE. So that an explanation of the bill could be made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that could be done.

Mr. LUCE. It would be necessary to get the consent of all those who object?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to make that request now?

Mr. LUCE. No.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that could be done, as it has always been done in the case of one objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, if one objects then the question must be submitted whether or not there are others, and if two others object that makes an objection?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. There can be no reservation except by common consent if anybody desires to make an explanation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that is correct.

Mr. LUCE. As we are establishing a policy, I wondered if it might not be better to ask unanimous consent to make a statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman means that in case somebody desires to explain the bill?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be necessary. For the information of Members, the Chair thinks he should state that as far as the Chair is at present advised he does not expect to recognize anyone to move to suspend the rules to-day. Objection is made to this bill by three Members.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENISON. Is there any record kept of those who object?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks their names will be in the RECORD the same as when one objects. Each one in this case objected individually.

Mr. DENISON. The name of each one of the three should be given in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. Three Members having objected to the consideration of this bill, the Clerk will report the next bill.

MONUMENT TO THE WOMEN OF THE UNITED STATES IN THE WORLD WAR.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (H. J. Res. 107) in relation to a monument to commemorate the services and sacrifices of the women of the United States of America, its insular possessions, and the District of Columbia in the World War.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? This is of the same class as the other. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. BLANTON, and Mr. STEAGALL objected.

The SPEAKER. The bill being objected to by three gentlemen, it is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. If the other gentlemen who objected have no objection, I shall have no objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] making any explanation he desires.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have no objection as a matter of principle.

Mr. DYER. It seems to me there would be no good in that unless the gentleman from Texas would say he would withdraw his objection.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I would not withdraw. I would give the gentleman from Massachusetts an opportunity.

Mr. DYER. Then I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLAIMS OF SEMINOLE INDIANS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5799) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Seminole Indians may have against the United States and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to hear an explanation of the bill before passing that stage.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the Seminole Tribe of Indians is one of the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma. This tribe is about to be emancipated; that is, it is about to come out from under the supervision of the Federal Government. Their lands have been allotted and their moneys divided among the members of the tribe. Since about the year 1898 the Government of the United States has had complete supervision over and disbursement of the funds of the tribe, and inasmuch as this tribe is about to be emancipated, the members want an opportunity to make an examination into the handling of their affairs, and if there are any objections they want an opportunity to go into court, exactly like a minor on becoming of age. The minor has the right to inspect a guardian's report, and this tribe wants to have the opportunity to except to any item or transaction of the Government. We should not object to permitting these Indians going into our own courts to present their claims.

Mr. TILSON. Does the gentleman contend that this bill contains all the necessary safeguards for the protection of these Indians and the United States?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sure it does. It has been carefully examined by the committee, and it has been carefully examined and favorably reported by the Secretary of the Interior. It is in the identical language of a similar bill that the House passed some three weeks ago with reference to the Cherokee Tribe of Indians. This is a unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, after having a favorable report from the department.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Would not these claims be barred by the statute of limitations?

Mr. HASTINGS. There are none of them that I know of that would be barred. They are never barred and should not be; the court so holds. The provisions of this bill are the usual language of jurisdictional bills for Indian tribes. I hope the gentleman will not object and permit this tribe to close its affairs.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman would agree to strike out line 4, referring to lapse of time and the statute of limitations, I would not object to its passage. If you are going to do that I shall not object.

Mr. HASTINGS. That language is in every one of these bills.

Mr. HAYDEN. That language, if the gentleman will permit me, is contained in every bill of this character, and the Supreme Court has held in many instances that lapse of time and the statute of limitations should not run against any Indians who are wards of the United States.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It runs anyway.

Mr. CARTER. Sometimes it does, and sometimes it does not. Let me state this to the gentleman: I had no part in the preparation of this bill or in the preparation of the report; but the attitude taken by the Government is that the Indian is in the nature of a minor or ward and the statute of limitations should not run against him. It has often been found, even where an Indian has exercised all the diligence he could to get into court or get his claim settled, that he could not get into court on account of his wardship; and I expect that would be found here if there is any bar set up to this litigation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If all the Indian Committee thinks this ought to pass, I shall not object.

Mr. SNYDER. This is surrounded by all limitations and safeguards that are contained in every jurisdictional bill. It is the language of the department and of the court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction be, and is hereby, conferred upon the Court of Claims, notwithstanding the lapse of time or statutes of limitation, to hear, examine, and adjudicate and render judgment in any and all legal and equitable claims arising under or growing out of any treaty or agreement between the United States and the Seminole Indian Nation or Tribe, or arising under or growing out of any act of Congress in relation to Indian affairs, which said Seminole Nation or Tribe may have against the United States, which claims have not heretofore been determined and adjudicated on their merits by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 2. Any and all claims against the United States within the purview of this act shall be forever barred unless suit be instituted or petition filed as herein provided in the Court of Claims within five years from the date of approval of this act, and such suit shall make the Seminole Nation party plaintiff and the United States party defendant. The petition shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed to prosecute such claim or claims under contract with the Seminoles approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and said contract shall be executed in their behalf by a committee chosen by them under the direction and approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior. Official letters, papers, documents, and records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence, and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorney or attorneys of said Indian nation to such treaties, papers, correspondence, or records as may be needed by the attorney or attorneys of said Indian nation.

SEC. 3. In said suit the court shall also hear, examine, consider, and adjudicate any claims which the United States may have against said Indian nation, but any payment which may have been made by the United States upon any claim against the United States shall not operate as an estoppel but may be pleaded as an offset in such suit.

SEC. 4. That from the decision of the Court of Claims in any suit prosecuted under the authority of this act an appeal may be taken by either party as in other cases to the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 5. That upon the final determination of any suit instituted under this act the Court of Claims shall decree such amount or amounts as it may find reasonable to be paid the attorney or attorneys so employed by said Indian nation for the services and expenses of said attorneys rendered or incurred prior or subsequent to the date of approval of this act: Provided, That in no case shall the aggregate amounts decreed by said Court of Claims for fees be in excess of the amount or amounts stipulated in the contract of employment, or in excess of a sum equal to 10 per cent of the amount of recovery against the United States.

SEC. 6. The Court of Claims shall have full authority by proper orders and process to bring in and make parties to such suit any or all persons deemed by it necessary or proper to the final determination of the matters in controversy.

SEC. 7. A copy of the petition shall, in such case, be served upon the Attorney General of the United States, and he, or some attorney from the Department of Justice to be designated by him, is hereby directed to appear and defend the interests of the United States in such case.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RESERVATION OF LANDS IN NEW MEXICO FOR ZIA PUEBLO INDIANS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2877) providing for the reservation of certain lands in New Mexico for the Indians of the Zia Pueblo.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this seems to be a bill setting apart some of the public domain for the Indians. Will the gentleman from New Mexico explain the purpose of it?

Mr. MORROW. The purpose of this bill is to give the Zia Indians, a small number of Pueblos, this land for reservation purposes. They have occupied and used this land for a great number of years. It is public land, and under the act of June, 1919, which restricted the President from further setting aside lands for Indian reservation purposes, an act of Congress is now required. This action is proposed because of the fact that the Indians have had this land, used it, and that one-fourth of their entire irrigated area is upon this land, the irrigated area consisting of 82 acres.

Mr. TILSON. Under what right have they been using this land—simply as squatters?

Mr. MORROW. Yes; I presume so up to the present time, but they have occupied the land and used it right along, and they are now asking the right to get title to the land as a part of their reservation.

Mr. TILSON. In other words, they have used Government land for an indefinite time, and this proposition is to give it to them?

Mr. MORROW. Yes; and to make it a part of their reservation. There are 386 acres all told, 82 acres of which they have used under irrigation.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORROW. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. They occupied that land long before our Government had it, did they not?

Mr. MORROW. They have had it for years and years, perhaps a century or more.

Mr. LITTLE. Before this Government came into existence?

Mr. MORROW. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. This tribe of Indians, then, has not been moved to this territory, but it is the original tribe of Indians, so far as the gentleman knows?

Mr. MORROW. Yes; and, as I say, they have used this particular land for years.

Mr. LITTLE. Where is the Zia Pueblo?

Mr. MORROW. It is in the northwestern part of Sandoval County, as I understand it.

Mr. LITTLE. These Indians are all farmers, are they not?

Mr. MORROW. They are using this particular land for farming purposes, 82 acres of it.

Mr. LITTLE. They were farmers there before the Americans came, were they not?

Mr. MORROW. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. So, as a matter of fact, we are trying to take their land?

Mr. SNYDER. No.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, we were trying to take it

Mr. SNYDER. No. The gentleman has stated the matter correctly. This is a part of the public domain and the Indians have been using it for more than 100 years without any title to it. What we are attempting to do is to put it into their reservation.

Mr. TILSON. And the gentleman feels that as a matter of right we ought to do it?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; it is a matter of right and justice, and it will be of very great assistance to them.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In what way will it be of great assistance to them?

Mr. SNYDER. They will not have to be in fear about somebody taking it away from them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOWELL). Is there objection?

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to deny the statement which has been made to the effect that this land was never a part of the public domain in the United States. If I understand the situation correctly, this land is within New Mexico, and has involved in it the same questions involved in all Pueblo land matters, and the title to these Indians goes back to the time of the Spanish Government.

Mr. MORROW. I do not think I made the statement that it was never a part of the public domain. I said it was now a part of the public domain, and these Indians have occupied the land and used it for a century or more.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, for the information of those who desire information, I think a fair statement of the situation is about this: These Indians are not squatters; they have owned this land, and according to the best evidence we have, have farmed a portion of it for more than 100 years. Now, that eighty-odd acres of irrigated land, taken in conjunction with the 200 or 300 acres of nonirrigable land, would make a very valuable home for some white man, and if we do not get this confirmed in the Indians pretty soon some white man of New Mexico will be grabbing it. I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. KENT rose.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is called for, and the question is: Is there objection?

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there anyone who can advise the House whether there is any oil or mineral under this land?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the regular order has been demanded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and the question is, Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby reserved and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or disposal under the laws of the United States and set apart as a reservation for the benefit, use, and occupancy of the Indians of the Zia Pueblo the tract of land in the State of New Mexico particularly described as follows: Lots 4, 5, and 6 and east half southwest quarter section 7; lots 1, 2, 3, and 4 and east half northwest quarter and east half southwest quarter section 18, all in township 15 north, range 2 east, New Mexico principal meridian, New Mexico, containing approximately 386.85 acres.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ALBANY INSTITUTE AND HISTORICAL AND ART SOCIETY, ALBANY, N. Y.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1018) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy in his discretion to deliver to the custody of the Albany Institute and Historical and Art Society of the city of Albany, N. Y., the silver service which was presented to the U. S. cruiser Albany by citizens of Albany, N. Y.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Albany Institute and Historical and Art Society, of the city of Albany, N. Y., for preservation and exhibition in such museum, the silver service which was presented to the U. S. cruiser Albany by citizens of Albany, N. Y.: Provided, That no expense shall be incurred by the United States for the delivery of such silver service.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FUNDS OF NAVAJO TRIBE OF INDIANS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 472) to authorize the deposit of certain funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of Navajo Tribe of Indians and to make same available for expenditure for the benefit of said Indians.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is not this an appropriation?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; this bill authorizes funds now held by the Secretary of the Interior to be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Navajo Tribe, and when so deposited to be made available for appropriation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This amount of money, $995, goes into the General Treasury?

Mr. HAYDEN. It goes into the General Treasury.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is in the General Treasury now in the general fund, is it not?

Mr. SMITH. No; it is a special fund for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; that is what they are trying to do by this bill. It is in the general fund.

Mr. HAYDEN. I suppose this money has been disposed of as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; and you now want to put it in a special fund.

Mr. HAYDEN. And make it available for appropriation out of the General Treasury for the benefit of the Navajo Tribe.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The language of the bill is "may be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Navajo Tribe of Indians."

Mr. HAYDEN. There is a fund in the Treasury now consisting of Navajo Indian money.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And when you provide for the payment of money out of a tribal fund, it is not an appropriation.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is a general provision of law that no Indian tribal funds may be expended, except for education of Indians, except by specific authority of Congress.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But it is not an appropriation when you take it out of the tribal funds.

Mr. HAYDEN. It must be appropriated by act of Congress from the tribal fund under the same procedure as an appropriation out of the general funds of the Treasury.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. We have been passing bills all along providing for the payment of money out of these different tribal funds and they hold that that is not such an appropriation as must come from the Committee on Appropriations, do they not?

Mr. CARTER. No.

Mr. HAYDEN. The House the other day passed the Interior Department appropriation bill and there is a long list of items in the bill appropriating money out of the Indian tribal funds in the Treasury.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, the Committee on Appropriations has the power, and I have been wondering when we passed these other bills whether they amounted to appropriations. Of course, there was one that contained a straight-out appropriation of $5,000, which I did not notice at the time. These other bills which provide for the payment of money out of the tribal funds are not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I will call the gentleman's attention to a very extended decision on that point by Mr. Barnhart, of Indiana, when he was here.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Am I right about it that they are not subject to a point of order?

Mr. CARTER. No; they are subject to a point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Then we can make a point of order to any of them.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole held that this rule about things being subject to a point of order was a beneficial rule, and so forth, to protect the Treasury, and that any position taken that the same procedure should not be taken and the same safeguards thrown around an Indian fund, which was a trust fund, as around the funds in the Treasury was to hold that a man might handle trust funds with less accountability than he could his own funds, and he said he could not maintain that position. It is a very splendid decision.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not remember the Barnhart decision, but I am very sure it has been held by occupants of the chair a number of times since I have been here that taking money out of a tribal fund and applying it in accordance with the law was not an appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this matter. We have a strict provision of law about that, which sets out that these funds shall not be used without a specific appropriation from Congress.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I remember I argued that at one time and read the provision and said it used the word "appropriates," and what I now want to know is if it is true that the Committee on Indian Affairs has no appropriating power why the committee reports these appropriations.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. CARTER. I will tell the gentleman. Candidly, if I had been on the floor when this other bill passed, which the gentleman spoke of a moment ago, I would have called attention to it and probably objected on account of the matter of committee jurisdiction.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to say that was done inadvertently. It was intended to amend it to read to authorize an appropriation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As soon as I get through talking with the gentleman from New York, then I will gladly yield. The gentleman from New York is talking now about the $5,000 appropriation.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am not talking about that. That got by because I did not notice it. We have passed bills here and are doing it right along, coming from the Indian Affairs Committee, that dispose of tribal funds.

Mr. CARTER. That might be possible because, perhaps, the disposition of those funds is provided for by a treaty.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman from Indiana is wrong about that.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask who has this money now—the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. HAYDEN. I presume that this money is in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TILSON. Then by this act we take it out of the general fund of the United States Treasury and put it into a special fund; is that correct?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman from Indiana will yield——

Mr. SNYDER. I wish the gentleman from Indiana would let me make a statement in reference to the statement he has just made.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; in order to avoid confusion, I will yield to just one gentleman at a time at present.

Mr. SNYDER. It has been the usage of the Committee on Indian Affairs, since the new rule, not to bring any legislation on the floor which carried an appropriation. This is the first bill which has come down from the committee with that language, and it was an oversight that the word "authorize" was not used in the bill where it carries an appropriation of $5,000. There has been no other bill from this committee which carried any semblance of an appropriation.

It is a fact beyond question, and has been ruled here many times, that appropriations of tribal funds must be made in the same way as appropriations of Treasury funds by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. This item came to Congress one or two years ago in an Interior Department appropriation bill. It was deemed by our subcommittee to be of a legislative character and hence out of our jurisdiction. Because of that belief, and feeling that it was a matter that ought to be cleared up and brought to the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I introduced the bill which has been reported favorably by the legislative committee.

I want to call attention to the facts which appear in the report. First, the proceeds would have been paid to Pete Coberly if he could have been found, but they have not found him. The net proceeds are $995, as the Secretary of the Interior says, and are carried as a special fund in the account of the superintendent of the Navajo Indian school in Arizona. In order to clean up that situation, to dispose of $995 that belongs to this Indian who has disappeared for 20 or 25 years, legislation is necessary to transfer the ownership of that money from Pete Coberly to the tribe. That is what this bill does. It is a transfer of the money from one Indian to the Indian tribe. It is not an appropriation. It is a transfer of the fund to the tribe and made available for appropriation. Of course, it can be later appropriated in any proper bill for the benefit of that tribe.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman seems to make it clear that this is not a fund in the Treasury and that we are not making an appropriation but are, in fact, legislating this money into the tribal fund in the Treasury. So that hereafter it will be available for appropriation as a part of the tribal fund.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I will not insist on the objection, neither will I make a point of order, but I would make a point of order to any direct appropriation by the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order in order to get some information. Pete Coberly is an Indian who disappeared and has not been heard from, and if he had been here the money would have gone to him. It is a trust fund held in the Treasury of the United States for him. Suppose he turns up next week and demands his money, or suppose five or six years from now after the money goes to the specific fund and has been used Pete Coberly comes in and says, "Give me my money." What are we going to do about it?

Mr. SNYDER. Let me say to the gentleman that Pete Coberly has been declared legally dead.

Mr. BLANTON. He can come to life.

Mr. SNYDER. After a man is declared legally dead they settle up his estate.

Mr. BLANTON. I doubt if you can declare a man dead when he is alive, and especially an Indian. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me say to the gentleman that if Pete Coberly were to reappear next week I have no doubt but that the Appropriations Committee would report an item to give it back to him. I assure the gentleman that there will always be at least that much money in the tribal fund.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to object, but I want the facts before the House. How long has Pete Coberly been gone?

Mr. CRAMTON. Twenty-nine years.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, if he has been gone 29 years I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOWELL). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $995, derived from the sale of land allotted to Pete Coberly, a Navajo Indian, who has been adjudged by the Secretary of the Interior to be legally dead and to have died without heirs, may be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Navajo Tribe of Indians and is hereby made available for expenditure for the benefit of said Indians.

The following committee amendment was read:

On page 1, line 8, strike out the word "expenditure" and insert in lieu thereof the words "appropriation by Congress."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEARL RIVER, MISS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5633) granting the consent of Congress to the Board of Supervisors of Hinds County, Miss., to construct a bridge across Pearl River, in the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Board of Supervisors of Hinds County, Miss., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pearl River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Jackson, State of Mississippi, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS KANKAKEE RIVER.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5737) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Kankakee River on the State line between section 19, township 31 north, range 15 east of the third principal meridian, in the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and section 1, township 31 north, range 10 west of the second principal meridian, in the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Kankakee River on the State line between section 19, township 31 north, range 15 east of the third principal meridian, in the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and section 1, township 31 north, range 10 west of the second principal meridian, in the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "river," strike out the word "on" and insert the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill granting the consent of Congress to the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Kankakee River at or near the State line between section 19, township 31 north, range 15 east of the third principal meridian, in the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and section 1, township 31 north, range 10 west of the second principal meridian, in the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana."

ALLOTMENT OF CERTAIN LANDS WITHIN FORT YUMA INDIAN RESERVATION, CALIF.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4804) to authorize the allotment of certain lands within the Fort Yuma Indian Reservation, Calif., and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I think that this should be explained.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to answer any questions the gentleman may want to ask.

Mr. TILSON. This seems to be a bill to vacate in whole or in part the withdrawal of lands for town-site purposes for a town known as Powell, and for the withdrawal for Indian school farm purposes all areas so vacated and to make such land available for allotment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the town site of Powell was established by the United States Reclamation Service a number of years ago. At that time there was no bridge across the Colorado River and it was thought that the town might be created within the project. Since then by joint action of the States of California and Arizona and of the Federal Government a bridge has been built so that the reservation land was made accessible to the existing town of Yuma, and no town grew up at Powell. The land lies there, and there are Indians that might use it if it were allotted to them. In the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior the highest use the land could be put to would be to allot it to Indians for farming purposes. As to the change in the location of the school farm, the land heretofore set apart for a school farm is some distance from the Fort Yuma Indian school and is not suitable for the purpose. There is available nearer the school a tract of land and the superintendent has asked to have it set aside for that purpose. To clear the whole situation up in one piece of legislation the bill was prepared in the Indian Office. We have examined into this legislation and have concluded that it ought to pass in the interest of the Indians.

Mr. TILSON. So that the conditions that prevailed at the time the other legislation was enacted have changed?

Mr. HAYDEN. Materially.

Mr. TILSON. And this legislation is now necessary to take the place of it?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is exactly the situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to vacate in whole or in part the withdrawal of lands for town-site purposes known as the town site of Powell on the Fort Yuma Indian Reservation, Calif., made pursuant to the act of April 30, 1908 (35 Stat. L. p. 77), and the withdrawal for Indian school farm purposes made pursuant to the act of August 1, 1914 (38 Stat. L. pp. 582–587), all areas so vacated being hereby made available for allotment in severalty under existing laws to any Indians entitled to allotment on said reservation who have not heretofore received an allotment.

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby further authorized to set aside and reserve for Indian school farm purposes any other lands within said reservation which have not heretofore been otherwise disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RECREATIONAL AREA WITHIN CROOK NATIONAL FOREST, ARIZ.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 498) providing for a recreational area within the Crook National Forest, Ariz.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which of course I hope will not be necessary, I suppose it would be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] to have an amendment after the word "established," on page 2, line 2, inserting the words "and without expense to the Federal Government," so that the operation of this local recreational scheme would be a local expense?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that some money has been expended or will be expended out of Forest Service funds, collected on the Crook National Forest, to aid in building a road out to this recreational area, and perhaps within it. For that reason I feel that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Michigan should not be adopted, since it would interfere with the use of forest road funds.

Mr. CRAMTON. My observation of the Forest Service is that if they can get a recreational space anywhere they can spend unlimited funds in providing a road to it and around it and every thing else. If the forest happens to be adjacent to a national park you can not tease a nickel out of them in a great many cases, but I guarantee if there is a 640-acre recreational space provided here the Forest Service may spend thousands on a road to it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I can guarantee that the receipts from the Crook National Forest available for road construction will not amount to any such sum.

Mr. CRAMTON. The terms of the bill authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to enter into such form of cooperation with "said board of supervisors as in his opinion will permit the fullest use of the lands for recreational purposes without interfering with the objects for which the national forest was established." I suggest that after that we add the words "without expense to the Federal Government."

Mr. HAYDEN. The sole and only purpose of the legislation is to prevent the very thing that the gentleman complained about this morning in his remarks on the Grand Canyon National Park, that some one will locate and maintain a mining claim within this recreational area after the proposed improvements are made. The land is now within the jurisdiction of the Forest Service. It is not subject to entry except under the forest homestead law, which the Secretary of Agriculture would not permit, but it is subject to mining locations. The only object in passing this bill is to prevent some one who finds a trace of copper or iron from locating a mining claim, and thereby interfering with the the use and enjoyment of this area by the public.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there a town somewhere near this?

Mr. HAYDEN. The towns of Globe and Miami are near by, and the county of Gila expects to contribute money to open up the road, so that the people can drive up to this timbered area and enjoy the cool mountain air.

Mr. CRAMTON. To what extent does the county expect to contribute?

Mr. HAYDEN. My understanding is that the county will contribute substantially, but just what the arrangement is I do not know.

Mr. CRAMTON. If you can assure us that Federal money will not be expended for other purposes in that area I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is my understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his objection. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, in his discretion, upon application by the Board of Supervisors of Gila County, Ariz., to designate and segregate for recreational development any lands, not to exceed 640 acres, within the Crook National Forest, Ariz., which in his opinion, are available for such purpose, and he is hereby authorized to enter into such form of cooperation with said board of supervisors as in his opinion will permit the fullest use of the lands for recreational purposes without interfering with the objects for which the national forest was established. Lands so designated and segregated, under the provisions of this act, shall not be subject to the mining laws of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FOREST RESERVES IN NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 377) limiting the creation or extension of forest reserves in New Mexico and Arizona.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TILSON. Reserving the right to object, if there is anyone in charge of this bill, I would like to have a considerable explanation before this passes the objection stage. It seems there is a considerable disagreement between the doctors in this case.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, I have perhaps spoken just a little carelessly of the Department of Agriculture, and I want to demonstrate my confidence in them by saying that their report on this bill is such as would force me to object.

Mr. MORROW. This law exists at the present time in all the States except New Mexico and Arizona. The object of the bill is to limit the creation of forest reserves by proclamation. New Mexico at the present time has 10,000,000 acres in forest reserves, and we have a great deal of State land under lease. The purpose is not to set aside land for any stockmen who just make a demand for forest reserves or additional areas for forest purposes.

The statement of the Secretary of the Interior is to the effect that legislation of the same nature has been enacted with reference to the States of Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Washington, Wyoming, and California, and then he adds:

In my opinion, the law should be the same as to all of the public-land States where conditions are similar, and I therefore recommend the enactment of S. 377.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman ought also to quote from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, which is directly to the opposite effect.

Mr. HAYDEN. I hope that the recital of some history will help the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] in making up their minds about this matter. You will remember that Theodore Roosevelt was an ardent advocate of the creation of forest reserves, and that Congress objected. Congress then passed a law naming all the Western States existing at that time and prohibiting the creation of any further forest reserves without the consent of Congress.

Mr. Roosevelt conferred with Mr. Pinchot, and thereupon included everything in the West that Mr. Pinchot desired as a forest reserve, and then signed the bill. At that time New Mexico and Arizona were Territories, and not States, and they happened not to be named in the act of Congress. All that we seek to do is to put Arizona and New Mexico on a parity with California, Colorado, and all the other States of the West, so that the same law shall apply to the public domain in those two States as in the others.

Mr. TILSON. As the law now stands, if the President sees fit to withdraw any land from settlement in the two States referred to it may be done without any further legislation?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, without coming to Congress at all.

Mr. TILSON. But if there should arise a case where it appears to the President that the public interests demand the withdrawal to be made, he would have to await the assembling of Congress and the slow processes of Congress in passing a bill to give him the authority.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Congress is required to do that in Colorado and California and the other States in the Union, why should it not have the same authority in Arizona and New Mexico? It has not worked to the detriment of the other States to have it so. There has been no difficulty, in my experience on the Committee on Public Lands, in procuring legislation adding to the forest areas wherever needed. All that is asked for here is to place Arizona and New Mexico on a parity with the other States.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the condition in the other States does not conserve the public interest there is no advantage to those two States in having them put on a parity with the other States. The Department of Agriculture, in making the report, says:

The department has frequently encountered embarrassment through the inability to add to national forests such lands which form parts of natural units for national forest administration—

And so forth. In connection with the bill which was passed just before this one was taken up, the gentleman from Arizona spoke of the action they desired to take in order to forestall somebody grabbing off recreation spots under the guise of a mining claim, and now in this bill it is proposed to throw these two States wide open, where somebody can grab off some forest land, when it ought to be added to the forest reserve. I note the two gentlemen, one representing Arizona and one New Mexico, and in view of the statement of the department that the public interest in those two States are handicapped by the present law, and feeling that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] wants to put all States on a parity, I will offer this amendment, and if the gentleman will accept it, then I will have no objection to the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute—

That hereafter a forest reservation may be created or any additions may be made to one heretofore created within the limits of any of the public-land States without act of Congress.

That would put all the States on a parity, and I hope the gentleman from Arizona will accept it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I beg to say that I believe it would be futile to do so.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

APPROPRIATION FOR CONSTRUCTION OF ROAD, FORT APACHE INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4117) authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a road within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill carries an authorization for an appropriation during the year 1924 of $50,000 and during the year 1925 of $50,000, and no part of these appropriations are to be expended until the Secretary gets certain guaranties from the State of Arizona. I am not entirely satisfied as to the merits of the bill, but in any event it would seem that the figures should be changed to 1925 and 1926. I presume this is a reprint of a bill that the gentleman has had under way for some time, and time has passed.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; I originally introduced the bill in that form.

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, during this fiscal year, 1924, nothing could be done.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is true. It was my error in so introducing the bill, and I shall be glad to change the dates if that will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would be glad if, in addition, the gentleman would make a statement as to the merits of the bill, the extent to which this road, if constructed, is to serve the purposes of the Indians, and to what extent it is to serve others.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan that this proposed road leads from the end of the present constructed highway to Whiteriver, and just beyond that point is the new Theodore Roosevelt Indian School at Fort Apache. The construction of this road will materially reduce the expense to the United States in carrying supplies to the school. The road going in there now has been called by everyone who has tried to go over it in bad weather one of the worst in the world. When the Army maintained troops at Fort Apache it cost more to maintain a soldier there than at any other fort.

Mr. CRAMTON. And this would be the only improved road reaching the Theodore Roosevelt School on the reservation?

Mr. HAYDEN. The only one. The money is payable out of the tribal funds of the Apache Indians, and their funds are ample.

Mr. CRAMTON. And one-half is to be at public expense?

Mr. HAYDEN. At the expense of the taxpayers of the State of Arizona.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized an appropriation of $50,000 from any tribal funds on deposit in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians of the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., during the year 1924, and $50,000 from any like funds during the year 1925—in all, $100,000—to remain available until expended to pay one-half the cost of constructing a wagon road between Cooley and Whiteriver, within said reservation: Provided, That no part of the appropriations herein authorized shall be expended until the Secretary of the Interior shall have obtained from the proper authorities of the State of Arizona satisfactory guaranties of the payment of one-half of the cost of the construction of said road or of one-half of the cost of such part thereof as may be constructed in any year.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the bill is open to amendment, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in line 6, the figures "1924" and insert the figures "1925," and in line 7 strike out the figures "1925" and insert the figures "1926."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 1, line 6, after the word "year" strike out "1924" and insert "1925," and in line 7 strike out "1925" and insert "1926."

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, simply to say that the only investigation the committee could make of this matter was to consider the information received from the gentleman from Arizona, who has made an explanation to the committee, and a favorable report from the department, and it seemed to the committee, from such information as it had, that it would be reasonably safe to authorize the appropriation, believing that later on, when the matter was before the Appropriations Committee, a more careful investigation could be made of the project itself and that such an investigation would be made.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am very glad the gentleman has made that statement for the guidance of the Appropriations Committee when the matter comes to them.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized an appropriation of $10,000 from any tribal funds on deposit in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians of the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., to be immediately available, for the construction of a suitable building, including fireproof vault, heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States Indian Agency at Whiteriver, on said reservation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move an amendment in line 10 by striking out the words "to be immediately available."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 2, line 10, strike out the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, that is merely a matter of form. The Appropriations Committee and the House will have full authority to make the appropriation immediately available if it is desired to do so, and it is unnecessary to include that language. The bill would be in better form without that language.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MONEY-ORDER ACCOUNTS BY DISTRICT POSTMASTERS AT THIRD AND FOURTH CLASS POST OFFICES.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4441) to provide for quarterly instead of monthly money-order accounts to be rendered by district postmasters at third and fourth class post offices.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, from such study as I have made of the bill, I am not clear as to whether it carries out the purpose that is intended. The title of the bill says:

A bill to provide for quarterly instead of monthly money-order accounts—

And so forth. The text provides that the bill is to be amended so as to read as follows:

To render quarterly, monthly, semimonthly, weekly, semiweekly, or daily accounts.

The title intimates they are going to do away with the monthly report and provide a quarterly report, but the text of the bill provides for reports at any time that anybody could possibly want them, from daily to quarterly.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. KENDALL. The Postmaster General recommended this amendment to the existing law by simply adding the word "quarterly." He says it will save a great deal of expense in accounting, and nothing is gained by going over these accounts monthly in third and fourth class offices.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does not the gentleman then think that either the bill should be amended to conform to the title or the title should be amended to conform to the bill? The title could be, to carry out the idea the gentleman has just expressed, "a bill to provide for quarterly money-order accounts." Then you add the word "quarterly" to the present law and you have that authority.

Mr. TILSON. As a matter of fact, as the law now stands, they are required to make monthly reports because the word "quarterly" is not now in the law, but by adding the word "quarterly" then the Postmaster General might order quarterly, monthly, semimonthly, weekly, or semiweekly reports, and they would order the quarterly reports in the case of the smaller post offices.

Mr. CRAMTON. This does not leave it with the department. The law says it shall be the duty of the postmasters who issue money orders to render quarterly, monthly, and all these other reports.

Mr. KENDALL. Not quarterly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to make a suggestion for his consideration. Would not your purpose be accomplished by striking out in the title of the bill the word "quarterly" instead of "monthly," so as to read "a bill to provide for money-order accounts to be rendered," and so forth, just as in the title?

Mr. CRAMTON. Or if you just strike out the words "instead of monthly" and make it provide for quarterly money-order accounts.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps the Postmaster General wishes to have that flexibility of administration.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not know that there is any flexibility because there is no discretion in the hands of the department. There is an express law that it is the duty of the postmasters to issue all these different reports.

Mr. TILSON. Evidently the title is misleading as it stands. The title is surely wrong, because it provides for quarterly instead of monthly money-order accounts, when, as a matter of fact, it provides for both as the bill now stands.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think the matter would be pretty fairly well served if we simply dropped the words "instead of monthly" out of the title. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield? I reserve the right to object, inasmuch as the gentleman from Michigan has taken his seat.

Mr. CRAMTON. I did not have the floor, I thought.

Mr. BLANTON. The present law provides that they may render their accounts monthly or semimonthly or weekly or semiweekly or daily, and when you have a long range of privileges like that, they take the highest always, and the custom has been to render only monthly accounts. The Post Office Department now suggests that they be permitted to render quarterly accounts, and the word "quarterly" is just added at the beginning of the present law, and that is the way the matter came about. Is the gentleman in favor of permitting them to render quarterly accounts? Your bank, I do not care whether the account is a small one or a big one, renders you a monthly statement, and I take it these postmasters ought to render a monthly statement. We have bills here frequently showing discrepancies in their accounts, and there would be much more leeway granted them if they had three months instead of one month in which to render a statement.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to modify my former observation. I note the language contains the word "or," so there does seem to be a discretion.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a discretion.

Mr. CRAMTON. And I suppose the department exercises it, so that my view would be entirely met if the words "instead of monthly" were taken out of the title.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think it ought to be extended, Mr. Speaker, and I object.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RURAL ROUTES.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4448) authorizing establishment of rural routes of from 36 to 75 miles in length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over and keep its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6429) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, in section 17, township 28 north, range 23 west, of the fourth principal meridian, in the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation in or near the northwest quarter of section 17, township 28 north, range 23 west, of the fourth principal meridian, between the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, as provided for in Public Law 451, approved February 27, 1923, are hereby extended, one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION OF PROPERTY OF DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 837) to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This measure contains an appropriation. My inquiry is whether, if no one objects to the bill and it is read for consideration, a point of order may be made against the appropriation? It is my opinion that the point of order would lie against the appropriation and would not be waived by not objecting to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order can be made at any time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I am going to ask the gentleman who introduced the bill if he will not consent to strike out, beginning in line 11, after the word "thereof," the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. BEGG. I will say yes; that is in there by oversight.

Mr. CRAMTON. And change the date of January 17, 1923, to 1924.

Mr. BEGG. The intent of the bill was to release them from future taxes.

Mr. CRAMTON. They will do pretty well if they get relief for all time to come.

Mr. BEGG. Yes. I move to strike out the semicolon after the word "thereof" and insert a period.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if we have not a general law on the subject?

Mr. BEGG. No; each piece of property has to go through the same procedure except schools and churches. This does not come under that direct classification.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What precedents are there for excepting this property?

Mr. BEGG. All the rest of the property owned by the same memorial association is now exempt. The Red Cross property is exempt, and institutions of that kind organized for some other purpose than financial profit.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It is my understanding that this hall is turned over for public use.

Mr. BEGG. Yes; the Bureau of the Budget has used it and the disarmament conference met there. It is for everything except for financial profit.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Are there any fees charged at any time?

Mr. BEGG. I think not, but I would not want to make that statement for a certainty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the property situated in square No. 173 in the city of Washington, D. C., described as lots 8, 9, and 10, inclusive, occupied by the Daughters of the American Revolution, be, and the same is hereby, exempt from and after January 17, 1923, from all taxation, so long as the same is so occupied and used, subject to the provisions of section 8 of the act approved March 3, 1877, providing for exemptions of church and school property, and acts amendatory thereof; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $289.72, the proportion of taxes on said lots since January 17, 1923, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay said sum of $289.72 to the treasurer of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. On page 1, line 11, after the word "thereof," strike out the semicolon and all that follows and insert a period.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the semicolon, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of line 11 and all that follows on page 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further amendment. In line 7 strike out the words "from and after January 17, 1923," and insert the word "hereafter," so that it will read "and the same is hereby exempt hereafter from all taxation."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CRAMTON: Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "from and after January 17, 1923," and insert the word "hereafter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CALUMET RIVER, CHICAGO, ILL.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6925) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Chicago to construct a bridge across the Calumet River at or near One hundred and thirtieth Street in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Chicago, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Calumet River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near One hundred and thirtieth Street, in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, and State of Illinois, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5549) to detach Jim Hogg County from the Corpus Christi division of the southern judicial district of the State of Texas and attach the same to the Laredo division of the southern judicial district of said State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, I think this butchery ought to be explained.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. The matter was fully considered in committee. It involves no additional expense; it is simply detaching one county from one district and attaching it to another. All the judges of the court having jurisdiction have made favorable comment upon it. The Department of Justice, to which it was submitted, approved of it, and there seemed to be no reason why the butchery should not take place.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Jim Hogg County of the Corpus Christi division of the southern district of the State of Texas be, and the same is hereby, detached from the said Corpus Christi division and attached to and made a part of the Laredo division of the southern district of said State.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. MARYS RIVER NEAR WILDS LANDING, FLA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6725) granting the consent of Congress to the States of Georgia and Florida, through their respective highway departments, to construct a bridge across the St. Marys River at or near Wilds Landing, Fla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this proposed bridge is at the same point where a bridge was authorized to be constructed by the Kingsland Bridge Co. at the last Congress. Is not that the fact, I ask the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think it is.

Mr. LANKFORD. Does the gentleman know whether or not there are negotiations now pending for the adjustment of the claim of the Kingsland Bridge Co. for the money they expended in the beginning of the construction of this bridge?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. So far as I know, there are no negotiations now pending. They have been pending and there has been considerable talk, but I do not think there is anything of any definite nature that is now pending. I am not informed exactly as to that.

Mr. LANKFORD. Reserving the right further to object, at the last Congress a bill was passed authorizing the construction of a bridge at this point by the Kingsland Bridge Co. That bridge company has expended considerable money in the beginning of a bridge at this point. The present bill would authorize the construction of a bridge by the States of Georgia and Florida at practically the same point. I understand negotiations are pending whereby the States of Georgia and Florida, or people representing them, are to buy the right of the Kingsland Bridge Co. and protect them in the money that they have expended. I am anxious for the construction of a free bridge at this point, and I am anxious for the passage of this bill, provided the parties who have already spent their money under the other bill could be protected—if not in whole at least to a reasonable per cent—but at present, with these negotiations pending, until those people can be at least partially protected I am forced to object.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is true that a bill was passed—I do not remember whether by the last Congress or some other Congress—authorizing private parties to construct a bridge, which it was understood was to be a toll bridge, at or near this place. This road is one of the main highways through the States of Georgia and Florida which receive Federal aid, and is the main highway from the north into the State of Florida. This bill, when introduced, was submitted by the committee to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Agriculture, and it has the consent of both departments. I will read here the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture under date of February 2, 1924, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, February 2, 1924.

Hon. SAMUEL E. WINSLOW,
Chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. WINSLOW: Careful consideration has been given to the bill H. R. 6060, transmitted with your letter of January 26, with request for a report thereon and such views relative thereto as the department might desire to communicate.

This bill would authorize the highway departments of the States of Florida and Georgia to construct and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Marys River at or near Wilds Landing, Fla., connecting Camden County, Ga., and Nassau County, Fla. The site indicated for the location of this bridge is on one of the primary roads included in the system of Federal-aid highways approved for the States of Florida and Georgia. This crossing is on State road No. 3 of the system of State roads designated by the Florida Legislature, and by act of May 23, 1923 (ch. 9310, 1923 Session Laws of Florida), the Florida Legislature passed a law prohibiting the construction or operation of any toll road or bridge on this particular highway of the State road system. The reason for the passage of this act by the Florida Legislature was that a private corporation was preparing to construct a toll bridge across the St. Marys River at the point indicated. It is the understanding of this department now that the bridge to be constructed by the highway departments of the two States will be submitted as a Federal-aid project and, of course, will be a free bridge. This department, therefore, would recommend favorable consideration of the bill.

Sincerely, HENRY C. WALLACE, Secretary.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman have the report which the Secretary of Agriculture made on the former bill which authorizes a toll bridge?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not think he made any, though I am not sure. Mr. Speaker, the secretary of the Brunswick Board of Trade, in the city of Brunswick, Ga., wrote me a letter, under date of February 4 of this year, in which he inclosed a letter from the secretary-treasurer of the State Highway Board of the State of Georgia, and I ask unanimous consent to insert those two letters in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

BRUNSWICK BOARD OF TRADE,
Brunswick, Ga., February 4, 1924.

Hon. FRANK CLARK, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CLARK: At the request of the Hon. H. B. Phillips, chairman of the State highway board, Tallahassee, Fla., I am attaching hereto an original letter of the State Highway Department of Georgia, dated February 2, 1924; subject, St. Marys River Bridge.

This, I believe, is the information that you desired at the hands of our mutual friend, the Hon. H. D. Phillips.

Very truly yours,

BRUNSWICK BOARD OF TRADE,
By FRED G. WARD,
Managing Secretary.

STATE HIGHWAY DEPARTMENT OF GEORGIA,
GENERAL OFFICES,
East Point, Ga., February 2, 1924.

Subject: St. Marys River Bridge.

Hon. FRED G. WARD,
Managing Secretary Board of Trade, Brunswick, Ga.

DEAR SIR: At the meeting of the State highway board, held November 30, 1923, Judge Phillips, chairman of the State Highway Commission of Florida, appeared before the board.

He stated that the Florida Highway Commission was ready to bear their part of the expense for building a bridge across the St. Marys River south of Kingsland. He stated that his bridge engineer had made tentative plans for a bridge at that point, stating that it would be about 700 feet in length and cost about $164,000. Upon request of the chairman, Judge Phillips stated that he would attend to the necessary legislation to obtain permission from the War Department and Congress to construct this bridge.

On motion, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the attorney for the board cooperate with Judge Phillips in drawing up a suitable resolution for submission to Congress to obtain the necessary act to permit Georgia and Florida to jointly build a bridge across the St. Marys River south of Kingsland."

I quote below for your information further excerpts from the minutes of the board on this same date with regard to the above-mentioned matter:

"Judge Phillips appeared before the board in executive session with regard to means and methods of financing and providing funds for the construction of the bridge over St. Marys River south of Kingsland.

"Upon motion, the following resolution drawn by the attorney for the board and Judge Phillips was adopted:

"Whereas the State Road Department of Florida has authorized the construction of a bridge across the St. Marys River and Wilds Landing, on the road between Jacksonville, Fla., and Savannah and Brunswick, Ga., and has already appropriated the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay Florida part of the cost, and has authorized the chairman of the board to negotiate with the State Highway Department of Georgia to secure the construction of such bridge; and

"Whereas it is necessary to secure the passage of a bill through Congress to authorize Florida and Georgia to construct such a bridge: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the chairman of the State Highway Board of Georgia be authorized to cooperate with the State Road Department of Florida in securing the passage through Congress of the necessary bill authorizing the construction of the proposed bridge: Also be it further

"Resolved, That the chairman of the State Highway Board of Georgia instruct the bridge engineer of Georgia to cooperate with the bridge engineer of Florida in making a survey and the drawing of the necessary plans for such bridge."

In addition to the above I wish to also quote the further resolution adopted by the board:

"Resolved, That on a basis of the estimated cost of $160,000 that $50,000 of Federal funds be allotted by Georgia for their share of construction cost of the bridge, or the proportionate amount of the cost that $50,000 is to the estimated cost of $160,000.

"Provided further, That provided it is impossible to place $50,000 of Georgia's Federal aid on this bridge that one-fourth of the cost be provided from Federal funds and the balance to meet the above proportions be allotted from State funds."

Trusting this will give you the information you desire, and assuring you of our desire to serve you at any time, I am,

Yours very truly,

H. G. SPAHR,
Secretary and Treasurer State Highway Board.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to say this in conclusion: I hope that my good friend from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] will not object and retard the progress of this great work. It is the purpose of the States of Georgia and Florida to construct a concrete and steel bridge across this river, costing $160,000. As I stated before, it is a part of the great highway system already commenced. It is the main highway into the State of Florida from the North. These parties claim that they have spent certain moneys. I do not know what they have spent. The fact is that the highway commission of the two States contend that whatever they may have spent is of no particular value to them in the construction of this great public work. I hope my friend will not insist upon his objection and cause this matter to be longer delayed.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I also trust my colleague from Georgia will not object to this bill. As stated by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] and also in the report, unless this bill is passed, this highway can not be improved because the State of Florida will not construct a hard-surfaced highway up to a toll bridge. This means much to our northern friends and to our friends in Georgia coming down into Florida. This bridge should be constructed at the earliest possible moment. I trust my colleague from Georgia will not object. There is nothing more that I can add to the statement of my colleague from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask further to incorporate in the RECORD the letter of Secretary Weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objections?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, referring to the letter of Secretary Weeks printed in the report, was the amendment to the plans made as suggested in the Secretary's letter?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

The letter of Secretary Weeks is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 4, 1924.

Respectfully returned to the chairman Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives.

So far as the interests committed to this department are concerned, I know of no objection to the favorable consideration by Congress of the accompanying bill (H. R. 6060, 68th Cong., 1st sess.) to authorize the States of Georgia and Florida, through their respective highway departments, to construct and maintain a bridge across the St. Marys River at or near Wilds Landing, Fla., connecting Camden County, Ga., and Nassau County, Fla., if amended as indicated in red thereon.

As the navigable portions of the St. Marys River do not lie within the limits of a single State, the consent of Congress is required under section 9 of the river and harbor act of March 3, 1899 (30 Stat. 1151), for the construction of a bridge thereover.

JOHN W. WEEKS, Secretary of War.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the people who constitute the Kingsland Bridge Co., and who began the bridge, are anxious for the construction of this bridge. They have offered to accept approximately 33⅓ per cent of the money that they have expended for the work already done there. Part of this money was expended for right of way, and they have agreed to transfer their right to build the bridge upon payment to them of 33⅓ per cent of the money already expended. There is no reason for the passage of this bill. The bill authorized the Kingsland Co., "their successors and assigns," to build a bridge at this point. If the State of Florida and Georgia, or the people acting for them, will go to these people and pay them one-third of what they have expended, they will transfer to the States of Florida and Georgia the right to construct the bridge, and the bridge can be constructed without this bill being passed by Congress and Congress being placed in the attitude of first authorizing a bridge and then passing another bill authorizing another bridge at the same point, and in effect confiscating the property rights of the Kingsland Bridge Co., which were acquired in good faith and under authorization of this very body.

I trust I will not be misunderstood in connection with this matter. I am extremely anxious for the construction of a bridge as proposed in the bill now pending. There is probably no one thing so vitally important to the people of both Georgia and Florida near the proposed bridge site and generally as the construction of a bridge by the two States at Wilds Landing as is now contemplated. The people in my district in Camden and adjoining counties, as well as the people of the whole State of Georgia, will be greatly benefited by this bridge. We simply can not afford to let the project fall through and not materialize.

I happen to occupy a very embarrassing position in connection with the matter. The people in my district will be helped much more than the people of any other section of Georgia by this bridge, and yet I find myself at present feeling duty bound to object to the present consideration of the measure.

About two years ago I received many requests from people in Georgia and Florida urging me to secure the passage of a bill authorizing the construction of a toll bridge by the Kingsland Bridge Co. at Wilds Landing. I was informed that there was no bridge there, and that the only way to cross the river was by ferry, which was dangerous, expensive, and at times impossible. It was urged that the Kingsland Bridge Co. were willing to undertake the construction of the bridge if proper authorization could be secured. I introduced a bill seeking this authorization. A similar bill was introduced in the Senate, and after the usual parliamentary procedure a law was enacted granting the Kingsland Bridge Co. the authority to construct a bridge. The Kingsland Bridge Co. began to spend money securing right of way, and as I am informed actually began construction of the bridge. A little later I was informed that there was a probability of getting a free bridge along the line now proposed. I took the matter up with the Kingsland Bridge Co. and told their officers that I wanted them to not be in the way of the construction of a free bridge on a public highway at Wilds Landing. They informed me that they were anxious for a free bridge, and that they had only begun a toll bridge at the insistance of people in both States who were anxious for a bridge rather than a ferry at this point. These officials also agreed with me that it would be a good plan for them not to spend any more money on their project, as the work might not be of value to the States provided a bridge was built jointly. The bridge company did, however, insist that it should be reimbursed certainly in part for the money actually expended in the enterprise. I concurred in this idea, and it was agreed that no demand would be made for promotion fees or attorneys' fees, and that the Kingsland Bridge Co. would agree to lose a large per cent of money actually expended in order to get the bridge now suggested. I understand that the Kingsland Bridge Co. is now willing to accept about 33⅓ per cent of money actually spent for its rights and to transfer its authorization to the States of Georgia and Florida, thus authorizing the States to build the bridge without any further act of Congress.

It is my information that negotiations are going forward looking to the adjustment of the matter in this way. I hope these negotiations will result in an amicable settlement of the matter. The bridge is very much needed, and I feel forced to object to its present consideration simply in order that the matter may be adjusted without controversy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BRIDGE ACROSS UNITED STATES CANAL, FLA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (S. 2014) to authorize the Park-Wood Lumber Co. to construct two bridges across the United States Canal which connects Apalachicola River and St. Andrews Bay, Fla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Park-Wood Lumber Co., a corporation organizing and existing under the laws of the State of New Hampshire, its successors and assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate two bridges and approaches thereto across the United States Canal which connects Apalachicola River and St. Andrews Bay, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in the county of Calhoun, in the State of Florida, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, upon the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, to grant permission to the said Park-Wood Lumber Co., under such terms and conditions as the said Secretary may deem equitable and fair to the public, to cross and occupy such public lands pertinent to the United States Canal as may be necessary for the bridge and approaches thereto

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar.

STATUE OF "SERENITY."

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (S. J. Res. 57) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the District of Columbia of a statue by Jose Clara personifying "Serenity."

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] explain the reason for the enactment of this bill.

Mr. LUCE. The statue of "Serenity," by Jose Clara, a noted Spanish sculptor, is one of the finest modern productions of art now in Paris. It has so pleased one of our citizens, Mr. Charles Deering, of Chicago, that at his own expense—a very considerable expense it will be—he desires to present to the city of Washington a copy of this statue. It is highly extolled by the connoisseurs in these matters, and will in the judgment of the Committee on the Library be a welcome addition to the beauties of the Capital.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, it is simply to be a copy of the original statue?

Mr. LUCE. I understand so; yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman think it is a wise policy on the part of Congress to authorize the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington of a replica of every beautiful piece of statuary that some connoisseur wishes to bring here? If we should give the privilege to one, why should we not give it to the others?

Mr. LUCE. If it be a work of art and truly ornamental I should for my part unhesitatingly accept it.

Mr. WINGO. I have a deep appreciation not only of the artistic temperament of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but also of the beauties of art, and while I am not an artist myself, I have enough of the artistic temperament to at least have a feeling of disappointment at the judgment exercised by these connoisseurs of works of art that have been erected in Washington heretofore. They demonstrate either that these connoisseurs themselves do not have a proper appreciation of art or that I myself am lacking in adequate appreciation of what constitutes an artistic creation. I think it is pretty generally understood that of all the numerous equestrian statues in the city of Washington, only one closely approximates the actual thing it seeks to depict, and that is the only statue that an ordinary cowboy who comes here does not want to shoot at. Who is this gentleman whose artistic temperament has favorably influenced his judgment with respect to this statue? Is he an artist or a moneygrubber?

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman who proposes to give the statue?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. I know nothing of him.

Mr. WINGO. Do you know anything about the judgment of Jose Clara?

Mr. LUCE. I do not profess to be an expert in these matters.

Mr. WINGO. I will be frank. I recognize my own artistic limitations, and possibly my education has been sadly neglected along that line; but as I read the bill, the title naturally affected me, and I could not from memory call forth any impression of Jose Clara. Who is he? I am not sufficiently versed in the Spanish language to recognize even the sex of the sculptor.

Mr. HUDSPETH. It is a man.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think that at this time the city of Washington is the proper place in which to erect a statue of "Serenity," however poor the attempt or however sublime the attempt may be to depict that condition?

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman will note that this statue is not to be erected on the Capitol Grounds. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. Does not the gentleman think that is the only appropriate place in Washington where we could erect it?

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, I might suggest the proper place would be adjacent to the Franklin School, near the school board. That might be the appropriate place for it.

Mr. WINGO. I may say to the gentleman that somebody is going to cause a great deal more disturbance in Congress than has been occasioned in the school board, and friends of the schools in Washington may withhold their support of the schools as long as those theorists and that group of theorists are in command of the situation.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry if what I have said should do any harm to that organization.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman think of any more appropriate place for the erection of a statue of that kind than at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. WINGO. No; I think a statue depicting "Serenity" is wholly out of place at this time in the District of Columbia. There are numerous statues in the world that are great works of art, and if you start the fad of allowing some man who has more money for this purpose than for other purposes to leave his imprint, even though second-hand, on the record of the Nation by putting up money for the purpose of erecting a replica here, you will have all these gentlemen coming in and doing the same thing, and where will you stop? There are some great statues in the world and statues of the great heroes of America that ought to be adorning some of our public places instead of these riders on horseback. We have had examples of statues erected in this city of Washington with the promise that no expense should be entailed upon the public. I think we have had that experience during my service here, and I think the Committee on Appropriations will recall cases where we allowed some works of art to be erected on the promise that it would be done without expense to the Government. I recall the late Mr. Mann, of Illinois, directing attention to an instance of that kind, where it cost the District government $1,200 a year to maintain a certain work of art that was contributed to the city with the understanding that it was to be without expense to the city. Unless I can get some accurate information about this statue of "Serenity" I shall have to object.

Mr. LUCE. I will be pleased to show the gentleman a picture of the statue.

Mr. WINGO. I am afraid the picture might becloud my judgment. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCE. In comment upon what the gentleman has said, I would heartily agree with him that in Washington, as in practically every city in the United States, there were erected in the last century many atrocious works that were disguised by the name "art." The standards of the people were not of a sort to encourage true artists.

I had the privilege once of making the dedicatory speech at the unveiling of a statue commemorating a commander in the Revolutionary Navy. Fortunately my remarks were conceived and delivered before I saw the statue, because when the sheet was removed it turned out to be an undersized figure of a boy in Civil War uniform, which evidently had been rejected by the first purchaser, because the feet were unfinished.

But within the last 20 years the temper of the people in these matters has very greatly changed, and in various cities—the city of Boston, for example—experts of recognized ability and public spirit have undertaken to dispose, if they can, of some of these atrocities by getting them out of sight, and to restrict hereafter the purchases and acceptances of works of art to those truly deserving.

Mr. WINGO. May I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. LUCE. May I just finish what I want to say. I think there is no Member of the House or Senate to-day who can go through the Chamber, between here and the other end of the Capitol, and be proud of the array of statues there shown to the public. I should hope the day will come when those statues may be taken out of there and put in some place at a distance from each other, so that the disparity in size and in artistic quality may not be so conspicuous. Temporarily we call it the "Chamber of Horrors," and, perhaps, that is an accurate designation of this ill-sorted aggregation. When Congress awoke and decided that the wise and prudent way hereafter was to put all these things in the control of a group of men, who had been selected for their knowledge of the subject, it created an Art Commission. We all know that immediately aroused criticism. Perhaps there is no body of people in the world so free with criticism as artists in their judgments on each other's work, and other folks follow their example in these matters. So the Art Commission has ever since been subjected to criticism from this floor and elsewhere, though, as far as I have observed, often quite unfairly. These men are men of high rank and they have been selected for their qualities as judges. Since they were invited to help us, we have made it our policy to refuse to accept anything which does not meet their artistic standards. This may be an imperfect method; possibly some other could be suggested, but none has been suggested.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand that the Fine Arts Commission has approved "Serenity"?

Mr. LUCE. All of our bills are now drawn so that action shall be subject to their approval.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman has concluded, may I offer a suggestion?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Because I do not want to appear in an improper light even in the gentleman's mind, much less in the RECORD. All I have said has not been said in a spirit of levity or a lack of appreciation of artists, but I have felt the exasperation the gentleman has felt—although it does not disturb me as much as it does the gentleman—in regard to those incongruous statues and the poor place in which they are erected. I am one of those who really believes that art, fine statuary, beautifully proportioned buildings, pictures, music, literature, and all those things, tell upon the character of peoples as much as anything else. They are a great and potent influence and I would not decrease the influence they have upon our national life at all, and I am only prompted to hesitate in this case because I have seen—what nearly everyone agrees is so—that the city of Washington, the Capital City, has had the misfortune to have some of the freakiest things on earth put up here in the name of art, things which the city of Washington should not have permitted to be put up at all.

Mr. LUCE. We can match them in Boston.

Mr. WINGO. But you can not match them to the same incongruous extent, because in the city of Boston their incongruity is more marked by reason of the wonderful setting of other things that are worth while, but in the city of Washington the majority of the stuff they call art is not artistic; if it is, then the American people have sunk very low in their artistic taste. The point I have been trying to make is this: One of the reasons why this conglomerate mess is here in Washington is because I do not think we have been careful enough.

I have made up my mind; for one, I am not going to agree to the giving of permission to put on public grounds any more of these things unless there is clear evidence, beyond peradventure, not based upon the judgment of one or two men, but clear evidence that not only is it a worthy thing to depict in stone or marble but that it is a fine work of art, and that it has correctly depicted the character of the man or the thought that is sought to be conveyed. You have great men in America, great statesmen, great musicians, and great writers, who ought to have a proper representation in marble in this Capital City who have not got it. I want to see something of that kind done instead of picking up something simply because some one, even though their judgment may be good, is caught with the beauty of some thing or other and says, "I have plenty of money, and I will put a copy of this somewhere that the Federal Government will give me the right to put it." It may be that if I saw "Serenity" I would be charmed with it and maybe would be willing to put it over in front of the Senate Office Building; but there is another statue—I think it is entitled "The Chained Greek Slave," which is down in the Corcoran Art Gallery. If the gentleman will have a replica of that put in front of the Senate wing of this building, I will be willing to bear the expense of that myself, poor as I am. With that statement, Mr. Speaker, unless my friend wishes to explain further, I will be compelled to object.

Mr. LUCE. I agree with the gentleman so thoroughly I want to ask him a question, if the gentleman will permit. The gentleman suggests that this matter should be decided by somebody in whom he will have confidence, does he not?

Mr. WINGO. I did not catch the full import of the gentleman's question.

Mr. LUCE. It is the desire of the gentleman that these works of art shall be passed upon by somebody in whom the gentleman has confidence?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; and I admit that I have not the capacity to do it.

Mr. LUCE. The House has seen fit by its rules to impose that obligation on one of its committees, an obligation not particularly desired, because it has no direct reference to the name of the committee—the Committee on the Library. However, the House has imposed this obligation upon us, and we, in turn, consult the commission created for the purpose—the Commission on Fine Arts.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, if you will permit, the gentleman always overpersuades me, and I am going to withdraw my objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask a question. The gentleman states that the Fine Arts Commission is to approve this memorial. The bill as it is drawn directs the Chief of Engineers to select a site and give permission to erect this memorial, upon the approval of the Committee on the Library with the advice of the Fine Arts Commission. Why does not the Committee on the Library approve of the memorial first and then the matter is settled, and not wait until the Chief of Engineers is directed to select a site and grant permission to erect the memorial and then have the committee vote to pass on the suitability of the memorial?

Mr. LUCE. The committee already has seen a picture of the statue. It would be impracticable for us to see the statue itself. We have seen a picture of it and we have, by the stipulation of the bill, undertaken that not only in the matter of the site but in the design of the memorial——

Mr. BLANTON. And the committee approves of it?

Mr. LUCE. The committee, so far as it has knowledge of the matter, approves of it, but by the terms of this and all similar bills the whole thing is subject to our control until the final completion of the memorial.

Mr. BLANTON. I will call the gentleman's attention to the last memorial, which was erected down here on the courthouse lawn to the memory of some distinguished local lawyer. There were some ministers of the town who, after its being mounted there, condemned it as indecent and objected to it, and certain other citizens of Washington objected to it, and in consequence they had every schoolboy in Washington going down there at all times of the day and evening in order to see it. That was passed upon by the Fine Arts Commission, was it not?

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman speaks of some matter with which I am not familiar.

Mr. BLANTON. That happened during the vacation when the gentleman was up in Massachusetts.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to select a suitable site and to grant permission to Charles Deering for the erection, as a gift to the people of the United States, on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, the Mall, and White House, of a Carrara marble statue of "Serenity," by Jose Clara: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Joint Committee on the Library, with the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, that it shall be erected under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the statue.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MAIL-MESSENGER SERVICE.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6482) authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for mail-messenger service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if this is not directly contrary to the usual policy of third-class postmasters carrying the mail, and what is the object of it?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. I will say in reply to the gentleman that, excepting the last proviso which is in the bill, I think the gentleman will find it is the identical language of the law under which we have been operating since 1916, and the necessity for this legislation grows out of the ruling by the Comptroller General in which he says that what we thought was permanent law is not, and that he will not permit this beyond the end of this fiscal year. There are some 19,000 mail messengers in the country, and therefore, unless there is some legislation of this character before the end of the fiscal year, we will find ourselves without the ability to carry on the mail-messenger service and special-delivery service like we have been doing since 1916.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What the gentleman refers to, I think, is a rider on an appropriation bill. It is not permanent law. The permanent law prohibits it to-day.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. We have been operating as though it were permanent law since 1916, and, evidently, the Congress thought it was, because there has been no legislation since then.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is a permanent law that prohibits this, is there not? The gentleman is on the Post Office Committee.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is a permanent law, is there not, prohibiting this being done?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. There may be, but I do not now recall the provisions if there is.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Somewhere there is a law prohibiting postmasters making contracts for carrying the mail.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Then there is evidently a conflict, because this was put in the law of 1916.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is a conflict, because that is a rider on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. And since that time the department has been carrying on this work under that provision of 1916.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is true, but that was simply a rider on an appropriation bill and is in conflict with the permanent law. I do not know that I have any objection to the fourth-class postmasters carrying the mail providing they can do the work, although I rather doubt the policy. My experience—and I have had some experience in the Post Office Department—is that no third-class postmasters have time for carrying the mail if they are rendering the service to the public they ought to render. This is what has happened and probably will happen now: These men take the contract and beat somebody out of a job and then turn around and give it to a man at starvation wages.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. My observation is that sometimes the third-class postmasters are almost in the class of starvation wages. The object of this bill is to legislate and keep the postal affairs going. While I want the mail messengers to get sufficient compensation, it is of more importance to see that the postal matters go ahead and that the postmasters be authorized to do what they have been doing for six or seven years—make contracts and see that the mail will be carried.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, the mail will be carried; it is up to the Government to see that the mail is carried.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. How?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. By contract.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. With whom?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Somebody will carry it. You have legislation by which the department can let a contract, and they are doing it in 20,000 cases.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. They are doing it under this law of 1916.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There are not many of these third-class postmasters. I doubt whether the gentleman can find a case in this country of a third-class postmaster that is carrying the mail. If he does carry the mail, he takes the contract, sublets it, and the men who are carrying the mail are doing it for $300 and are paying to the postmaster a part of the wages that they ought to get. What is the minimum wage of a third-class postmaster?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. I do not now recall the minimum salary.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think it is $1,200. I do not think a third-class postmaster ought to be permitted to carry the mail, make the contract, turn around and shave it $50 or $100, and let it to somebody else.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. The gentleman knows that this is subject to the approval of the Post Office Department.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I know the Post Office Department very well, and in letting a contract they always beat the fellow down until he can not exist on the small wages that he gets.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. May I ask if the gentleman from Iowa is going to object to this?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, I will object unless the third-class postmasters are taken out. Third-class postmasters have plenty to do. If any gentleman knows of a third-class postmaster that is attempting to carry the mail, I would like to know the town he is in.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. I should hesitate to single out the third-class postmasters and prevent them from making a contract, for, in a way, that would indicate that the third-class postmasters were not capable of doing it. If I understand the position of the gentleman, he will object unless I consent to excepting third-class postmasters, and inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPROUL], who was to have charge of the bill, is in a committee hearing—in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads—I should much prefer to have the bill maintain its place on the calendar and be passed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman from Iowa withdraw his objection. I have in my district a case where the Post Office Department entered into an illegal contract with a man in a small place, accepted his services for a great many months, and then the Comptroller General of the United States refused to pay him. It arose in this way: The man died suddenly while on his route, performing both offices. You could not get a man to perform the work; you could not get a postmaster in the community. His uncashed checks, which he had no suspicion were wrong, were found among his effects. I had the matter up with the Post Office Department, trying to get them to pay the money to the widow, which the man had actually earned, and the Comptroller General will not pay it or allow it to be paid.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That case would not be affected by this legislation, if it was an illegal contract. Was the man a third-class postmaster?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Either a third or a fourth; I do not know which.

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. The reason for urging this legislation is that there should be permanent legislation, and frequently there are changes in the mail messengers that carry the mail and it is hard to keep a contract in effect, and for that reason it should be left in the hands of the postmaster.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I suggest, if the gentleman does not want to do that, he can restore it to the calendar and then the next day it will take three people to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio that the bill go over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

MEDALS TO TEXAS CAVALRY BRIGADES.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 593) authorizing the issuance of service medals to officers and enlisted men of the two brigades of Texas Cavalry organized under authority from the War Department under date of December 8, 1917, and making an appropriation therefor; and further authorizing the wearing by such officers and enlisted men on occasions of ceremony of the uniform lawfully prescribed to be worn by them during their service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to procure a bronze medal of appropriate design, with a bar and ribbon, together with a rosette or other device to be worn in lieu thereof, to be presented to each of the several officers and enlisted men of the two brigades of cavalry organized by the State of Texas, under authority from the War Department of date of December 8, 1917, who served therein prior to November 11, 1918: Provided, That such medals shall not be presented to men who have, subsequent to such service, been dishonorably discharged from the service or deserted: Provided further, That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying this last paragraph into effect: Provided further, That the several officers and enlisted men to whom such medals may be presented are hereby authorized to wear, on occasions of ceremony, the uniform lawfully prescribed to be worn by them at the time of their service.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 7, at the beginning of the line, insert the words "authorized to be," and page 2, line 13, after the word "service," insert a colon and the following: "Provided, This act shall not be considered as conferring upon the members of said organizations the benefits of the war risk insurance act or to confer a pensionable status to the members of said organizations, and that this act shall not be deemed to constitute a precedent for the future granting of such rights."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill authorizing the issuance of service medals to officers and enlisted men of the two brigades of Texas Cavalry organized under authority from the War Department under date of December 8, 1917, and authorizing an appropriation therefor; and further authorizing the wearing by such officers and enlisted men on occasions of ceremony of the uniform lawfully prescribed to be worn by them during their service."

PLACING PUBLIC DOCUMENTS TO CREDIT OF INCOMING MEMBERS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7039) to amend section 72 of chapter 23, printing act, approved January 12, 1895.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. McKEOWN. This bill is simply an amendment of the present statute which has been construed to prevent a new Congressman from having the documents that really belong to him assigned to him.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I understood that this was the Kiess bill which applied to salaries.

Mr. McKEOWN. No; this has nothing to do with salaries.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman whether the Committee on Printing has ever considered any way of informing Members when documents become accessible? In my experience here I have from time to time learned of documents which I would have been glad to get and distribute if I could have known of it at the time that they were ready for distribution, but in many of those cases only by accident did I personally ever hear of the fact that such documents were on hand.

Mr. McKEOWN. I will say that the method employed by the department is to send a card to each Member at the time that the documents are available for distribution, and they go to the gentleman's office regularly every time there is any document for distribution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That is correct. The folding room does that. It sends a card every time anything is placed to your credit, but the gentleman from Massachusetts could to-day send a request to the superintendent of the folding room and ask him to advise the gentleman of everything to his credit, and by return mail he would get a statement of every document that was to his credit.

Mr. LUCE. That I understood; but I had the impression that there were documents printed which had not been called to the attention of my office. Possibly I am in error.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman perhaps has in mind those that go to the document room. Of them no notice is given, but notice is given of those that go to the folding room, where there is a stated allotment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 72 of chapter 23, printing act approved January 12, 1895, be amended so as to read as follows:

"That the congressional allotment of public documents printed after the expiration of the term of office of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall be delivered to his or her successor in office.

"Any Senator, Representative, or Delegate having public documents to his credit at the expiration of his term of office shall take the same prior to the convening of the next succeeding Congress, and if he shall not do so within such period he shall forfeit them to his or her successor in office."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word so that I may have the floor for just a moment. I think the point raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is a good one, because only those documents which are distributed through the folding room are the ones of which a Member gets notice. For that reason all the documents printed ought to go through the folding room, in my judgment. Then each Member would get a pro rata share. A great many valuable documents are printed and go to the document room. Members have no notice whatever of them because there is no allotment of them to Members, and the only way that a Member can get them is to go to the document room and ask for them, and sometimes a Member will ask for more than should be distributed to one Member. If all Members asked for them and got as many as they wanted, there would probably not be sufficient to go around. Therefore, I wish the Printing Committee would take it up and see that all documents, outside of bills and committee reports, which are printed for distribution will go through the folding room so that every Member may get his proper number of them.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Does not that also apply to maps issued by the Geological Survey?

Mr. BLANTON. No; they are distributed direct to us by that bureau. You get notice of them from the Geological Survey. Everything that goes through the folding room you get notice of, and you are told that there are so many copies to your credit from time to time. I was speaking of documents that go to the document room which are not distributed through the folding room and notice of which is not sent to you, and you do not get them unless you happen to know about them and go there and ask for them, and then sometimes you ask for them too late.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman, I am sure, does not wish to advocate a policy of waste such as that would be. It would mean that all documents that are printed would be allotted equally to every Member of Congress whether he has any use for them or not.

Mr. BLANTON. Why should they not be?

Mr. TILSON. Some Members need a large number of particular documents, because they are valuable to them and to their constituents, and they have no use for and do not care to have copies of other documents at all.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose there are only enough for three copies to go to each Member, and the gentleman from Connecticut is the only one interested in that document. I know that by applying to his colleagues he can get practically the full quota of them transferred to him; but the membership of the House ought to have the right of disposition of these documents. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is correct. We ought to have notice of the number that will go to the document room and of their availability.

Mr. TILSON. There should be a different rule in regard to different documents. Some documents are of such a character, of such general usefulness, that each Member ought to have his quota. Other documents, of a different kind, ought to be placed somewhere so that Members who need a large number can get that number, and those who do not care for them need not have any credited to them, because they lie there in the folding room and go to waste, just as so many thousands of other documents are doing to-day.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think that every document printed by the Government ought to be equitably distributed among the Members, who in turn distribute them to the people in their districts asking for them?

Mr. TILSON. I think they should be distributed, but distributed in an economical way.

Mr. BLANTON. The point that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] was making was that the documents that go to the document room are documents that he does not know about, sometimes, and finds out too late that some of them would have been valuable to him, but he has not made application for them, and then the supply is exhausted.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Otherwise, I would ask unanimous consent that we might go ahead with the calendar.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word just there. I oppose the gentleman's pro forma amendment. Whenever documents are made House documents—and all these matters that are of any considerable consequence are put through the folding room and distributed through the folding room—then every Member gets a card stating that he has so many of those things there.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says we ought to have all of these documents that go into the document room distributed in some way. That is where every bill goes that comes here. Would you have notice given you of every bill that is introduced? In that case you would have to have an additional room in your office to take care of the bills that are printed. There is one very easy way to give everybody notice, and that is, whenever there is a document of sufficient importance to warrant its distribution, to have a resolution passed to distribute it through the folding room. Very few documents get buried out there in the document room. Most of the things that come from the document room are bills, resolutions, reports, and messages of the President, and other things of that kind, and the President's messages always, when considered of great importance, are made documents and pass through the folding room.

Mr. WINGO. I would like to get a little information. How can I protect my supply of Yearbooks without locking them up in my office?

Mr. STEVENSON. I know of no way except by invoking the law against larceny.

Mr. WINGO. They write me from the Government Printing Office about my share of allotments, and it would take a corps of Philadelphia lawyers to interpret what they mean.

I know of a case where one gentleman had three rooms full and I was short.

Mr. STEVENSON. Was that gentleman on the Printing Committee?

Mr. WINGO. No; and I am not saying a word about any member of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman tell me about the report of special or select committees?

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, a report from a special or select committee goes to the document room when it is printed. If it is deemed of such importance that somebody asks that it be made a House document and distributed through the folding room, then that can be done. All that is needed is a House resolution.

Mr. LUCE. Would it not be practicable to have printed a bulletin naming a list of documents that are printed from day to day?

Mr. STEVENSON. That could be done through the folding room without trouble. I did not contemplate anything of that kind, but if there were a bulletin issued to tell us what we might receive from time to time that would interest us; I am sure it would often be of convenience to us.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Texas withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

DATE OF THE CONVENING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent to file a minority report with reference to House Joint Resolution 93. Four Members sign the minority report, two Democrats and two Republicans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The minority views to be printed?

Mr. JEFFERS. Yes; the minority views to be printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to file a minority report on House Joint Resolution 93.

Mr. JEFFERS. It is a resolution out of the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress in regard to the change in the date for the convening of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RAPID CITY INDIAN SCHOOL, SOUTH DAKOTA.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2812) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota, Is there any question of any oil or minerals in this land?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No; I have never heard it suggested that either oil or mineral existed in the tracts you refer to. This bill was introduced at the last session and passed in the House, but did not get through the Senate.

Mr. WINGO. What is the necessity for selling this land?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The fifty-five one-hundredths of an acre tract is cut off from the school reserve by the public highway, and the 3.59-acre tract is cut off by the railway and right of way, so that it is inaccessible for all practical purposes, so far as the school is concerned.

Mr. WINGO. What are these tracts of land used for now?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They are not used for any purpose whatsoever; they are simply patches of weeds. The school desires to sell these two tracts and have the funds turned over for the benefit of the school.

Mr. WINGO. What is the necessity for the proposed amendment as to net proceeds? Do you contemplate the Secretary will have some expense in selling these tracts of land?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. None, except the expense of advertising the land for sale at public auction.

Mr. WINGO. Does anybody want these lands?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not think there is anybody that the department has in mind who desires these lands especially.

Mr. WINGO. What is the character of the school to which these lands now belong?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. This is an Indian school. It has, perhaps, between 200 and 300 Indian pupils.

Mr. WINGO. If these two tracts are sold, how much land will the school have left?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not know what the acreage is, but they have a considerable acreage.

Mr. WINGO. As much as 100 acres?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. About 100 acres, I understand. If the tracts described in the bill are sold, it would take only fifty-five one-hundredths of an acre in one corner and cut off another corner of 3.59 acres. It does not affect the tract of land in any way on which the school is located.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Can the gentleman state what the estimated value of these two little tracts of land is?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not know exactly the value of that land, but I should say that land there would be worth in the neighborhood of $100 an acre.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Therefore, these two tracts of land would not be worth more than $100?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes; they would be worth more than that; they would be worth between $400 and $800, I should say, depending on the amount of competition for them.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. And this money goes to the school?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes, under this bill should it become law.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Has the gentleman any idea of anybody who might buy these tracts of land?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. There is one gentleman that I know is interested in getting possession of one of the tracts.

Mr. WINGO. What does he want to use it for?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I think the fifty-five one-hundredths of an acre adjoins some residence property or a small tract of land which he owns near the city. But of course he will have to bid against any other bidders there might be. As to the other tract, of 3.59 acres, I do not know of anybody who is interested in it.

Mr. WINGO. And the gentleman is sure there is no oil under this land?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No oil that I know of.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that we passed legislation this morning giving the Department of the Interior the right to sell this land, and the only reason we need this legislation is that they want to use the money obtained from the sale of this property for the benefit of the school and not have it go for the benefit of the tribe.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Who makes the appraisals provided for in the bill?

Mr. SNYDER. The regular appraisers of the department.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I assume it will be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman to have the word "expenditure" in line 10, page 2, changed to "appropriated"? The language as it stands is, in effect, an appropriation.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I know of no objection to that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, could the gentleman tell us about how many miles this land is situated from the Teapot Dome?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, it is a considerable distance away.

Mr. BLANTON. One hundred and fifty or two hundred miles?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes; at least that.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, the 55 acres——

Mr. WILLIAMSON. No; the one tract comprises only fifty-five one-hundredths of an acre.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, even that could contain a very valuable well, if there was any oil there.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is true if there was any oil there, but we do not know of any oil there.

Mr. BLANTON. Some of those wells flow about 12,000 barrels of oil a day, do they not?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Well, we are not disposing of this land through the Department of the Interior, but through the action of Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. When the country is in a turmoil, and we are appropriating—not with my consent, however—$100,000 out of the Treasury to employ special attorneys to get back valuable oil lands that have been sold, does the gentleman think it is a wise policy just now to dispose of any other Government land out in this direction?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I think it is wise to dispose of these two little individual tracts; they are of no possible service to the school. I have seen the tracts myself, and they are simply weed patches, and the school wants to get rid of them.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can assure us that they are not going into any Sinclair-Doheny syndicate?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes; I think I can assure the gentleman of that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to sell and convey, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, two parcels of land included within the Rapid City Indian School Reserve, S. Dak., the first containing fifty-five one-hundredths of an acre, being a portion of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, section 4, township 1 north, range 7 east, Black Hills meridian, south and east of the Pennington County Highway; the second, containing 3.59 acres, being a portion of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section 8, township 1 north, range 7 east, Black Hills meridian, south and east of the Rapid City, Black Hills & Western Railroad right of way: Provided, That the proceeds derived from the sale of this land shall be available for expenditure for improvements at said Rapid City Indian School.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 3, page 1, strike out the word "and."

In line 4, page 1, strike out the word "directed" and, after the word "convey," insert "at not less than their appraised value."

In line 6, page 1, strike out the word "Reserve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "grounds."

In line 7, page 1, after the word "containing," insert the word "approximately."

In line 7, page 1, after the word "acre," insert the words "in the southeast corner."

In line 7, page 1, strike out the words "being a."

In line 8, page 1, strike out the pord "portion."

In line 10, page 1, after the word "meridian," insert the word "lying."

In line 11, page 1, after the word "containing," insert the word "approximately."

In line 12, page 1, strike out the words "being a portion" and insert in lieu thereof "in the southeast corner."

In line 1, page 2, after the word "meridian," insert the word "lying."

In line 3, page 2, insert the word "net" between the words "the" and "proceeds."

In line 4, page 2, strike out the words "this land" and insert in lieu thereof the words "these tracts."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move an amendment on page 2, line 10, by striking out the word "expenditure" and inserting the word "appropriation."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNYDER: Page 2, line 10, strike out the word "expenditure" and insert in lieu thereof the word "appropriation."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands not longer needed for the Rapid City Indian School."

TO LOAN TO THE COLLEGE OF WILLIAM AND MARY IN VIRGINIA TWO OF THE CANNON SURRENDERED BY THE BRITISH AT YORKTOWN ON OCTOBER 19, 1781.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1831) to loan to the College of William and Mary in Virginia two of the cannon surrendered by the British at Yorktown on October 19, 1781.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas the College of William and Mary in Virginia was intimately associated with the American Revolution, having furnished from its alumni the President of the First Continental Congress, four signers of the Declaration of Independence, including its draftsman, and many officers and soldiers of the patriot army; and

Whereas Washington's first public service was under a surveyor's commission issued by said college, and his last was as its chancellor; and

Whereas its connection with the final Revolutionary campaign was especially close, its main building having been used as a hospital and its other buildings as headquarters of our French allies; and

Whereas it is the desire of patriotic citizens to utilize the great traditions and historic atmosphere of this college by establishing there a school of American government and citizenship in which our youth shall be trained to a proper understanding of our Government: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to loan to the College of William and Mary in Virginia two of the cannon surrendered by the British at Yorktown on October 19, 1781, which are now at Old Point Comfort, Va., together with proper mounts, the same to be held by said college subject to the right of the Congress at any time to amend or repeal this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Strike out all of the "whereases."

Page 2, line 7, after the word "Virginia," strike out the words "together with proper mounts."

Page 2, line 9, change the period to a colon and insert "Provided, That the War Department shall not incur any expense because of the loan of the cannon authorized herein."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

DAM ACROSS BYRAM RIVER.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6943) granting the consent of Congress to the village of Port Chester, N. Y., and the town of Greenwich, Conn., or either of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Byram River.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the village of Port Chester, N. Y., and the town of Greenwich, Conn., or either of them, to construct, maintain, and operate, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, a dam across the Byram River at or near such village and town: Provided, That the work shall not be commenced until the plans therefor have been submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, and by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That this act shall not be construed to authorize the use of such dam to develop water power or generate hydroelectric energy.

SEC. 2. That the authority granted by this act shall cease and be null and void unless the actual construction of the dam hereby authorized is commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval of this act: Provided, That from and after 30 days' notice from the Federal Power Commission, or other authorized agency of the United States, to said village and town, or either of them, that desirable water-power development will be interfered with by the existence of said dam, the authority hereby granted to construct, maintain, and operate said dam shall terminate and be at an end; and any grantee or licensee of the United States proposing to develop a power project at or near said dam shall have authority to remove, submerge, or utilize said dam under such conditions as said commission or other agency may determine, but such conditions shall not include compensation for the removal, submergence, or utilization of said dam.

SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a few questions about the bill. Is it a bill granting permission to construct a dam in a navigable stream?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize the restoration or reconstruction of an ancient dam over a tidewater creek, the Byram River, which forms the boundary line between the State of New York and the State of Connecticut. It was previously a dam for the purpose of a gristmill. It was removed some years ago for the purpose of the construction of a bridge over the stream and also for sanitary reasons, the village having had no sewerage facilities. This stream is only about 150 yards wide. The sewerage has been completed, or was completed years ago, and, really, for scenic purposes and for purposes of gratifying the æsthetic sense of the community, so as to avoid a considerable rise and fall of the tide, and to enable them to establish a parkway there, it is desired to reconstruct this dam.

Mr. BURTON. When was the original permit for its construction given?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. There probably was no original permit. The dam was an ancient dam constructed way back in the good old colony days.

Mr. BURTON. Is it a navigable stream?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The stream may be navigable for row boats.

Mr. BURTON. This was referred to the War Department?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. And they approved it?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Absolutely; there is no objection to it.

Mr. BURTON. Is there any special provision in the bill to the effect that it is in accordance with the national water power act of 1920?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Absolutely. If the gentleman had noted the reading of section 2 of the bill, the gentleman would see that it is made subject to all the provisions of the national water power act, and further the bill contains the provision that this act shall not be construed to authorize the use of such dam to develop water power or generate hydroelectric energy.

Mr. BURTON. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

GIRLS' DORMITORY AT LAPWAI INDIAN SANATORIUM.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 192) to provide for a girls' dormitory at the Lapwai Indian Sanatorium, Lapwai, Idaho.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States the sum of $50,000 for the purpose of constructing and equipping a girls' dormitory for the housing of patients being treated for tuberculosis in the Lapwai Indian Sanatorium, said dormitory to be erected on the grounds now occupied by the Lapwai Sanatorium, at Lapwai, Idaho.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 3, after the word "hereby," insert "authorized to be."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the name of the sanatorium is not "Lapwai Indian Sanatorium," but "Fort Lapwai Sanatorium," and I ask to have the bill amended to correct the language.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Line 7, page 1, strike out the words "Lapwai Indian Sanatorium" and insert "Fort Lapwai Sanatorium," and in line 8 strike out the words "Lapwai Sanatorium" and insert the word "sanatorium."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the title will be amended to conform with the amendments.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REGISTERED MAIL MATTER.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6352) to authorize the Postmaster General to fix the fees chargeable for registration of mail matter, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman in charge of the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by request, I ask that the bill go over without prejudice. Both the author and the gentleman making the report are absent in committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman any reason for not disposing of it now?

Mr. MOORE of Ohio. None, except that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] asked me if I would make this request. I am not prepared to go into the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the circumstances I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill may go over without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE FOR CONTROL OF TRAFFIC IN HABIT-FORMING NARCOTIC DRUGS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 195) authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in two international conferences for the control of the traffic in habit-forming narcotic drugs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEHLBACH). Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I object.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may retain its place on the calendar.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the House joint resolution may retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

INCORPORATION OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1869) for the incorporation of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the organization known as the Grand Army of the Republic, with a membership limited to persons who served as soldiers and sailors of the United States Army and Navy or Marine Corps and Revenue Cutter Service between April 12, 1861, and April 9, 1865, in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and of such State regiments as were called into active service and subject to the orders of the United States general officers between the dates mentioned, and have been honorably discharged therefrom after such service, is hereby created a body corporate and politic of the District of Columbia, by the name of "The Grand Army of the Republic," by which name it shall be a person in law, capable of suing and being sued, and of having and exercising all incidental powers as a litigant or otherwise as if it were a natural person, with power to acquire by purchase, gift, devise, or bequest, and to hold, convey, or otherwise dispose of property, real or personal, as may be necessary or calculated to carry into effect the patriotic, fraternal, and charitable purposes of its organization, as such purposes are avowed and declared in its rules and regulations.

SEC. 2. That the supreme governing and controlling authority in said organization shall be the national encampment thereof, composed of representatives from the several department encampments as are now or may hereafter be organized: Provided, That there shall never be any change in the plan of organization of said national encampment that shall materially change its present representative form of government or render possible the concentration of the control thereof in the hands of a limited number, or in a self-perpetuating body not representative of the membership at large.

SEC. 3. That the qualifications for membership in said organization, except as they are limited by the provisions of section 1 of this act, and the rights and privileges of the members thereof, shall be such as are fixed by the ordinances, rules, and regulations adopted by said national encampment, and the meetings of said organization, whether for the transaction of business or otherwise, may be held at any place in the United States.

SEC. 4. That the activities of said corporation shall be exercised through and by the following agencies, in accordance with the laws, rules, and regulations now in force, or such as may be hereafter enacted by the national encampment thereof, namely:

First. Through the national encampment, its officers and committees.

Second. Through such department encampments as may have been heretofore or as may be hereafter organized, their officers and committees.

Third. Through such posts as may have been heretofore or may be hereafter organized, their officers and committees.

Such department encampments shall be subject and subordinate in authority to the national encampment, and such posts shall be also subject to such control, exercised through the department encampment and department officers of the particular department to which it belongs.

SEC. 5. That the corporate existence of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the exclusive rights of its surviving members to wear the insignia of membership therein, shall terminate only when the last of its members dies: Provided, however, That if at any national encampment hereafter held a memorial shall be adopted by the vote of three-fourths of the members present, reciting that because of the decrease in its membership, or because of the age and infirmity of its surviving members, it is no longer advisable and practicable to hold future national annual encampments, such action shall not operate to deprive said organization of any of its corporate powers, but the government thereof may be modified to provide for such contingency, subject to the restrictions contained in section 2 of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall in any manner affect the right or the power of such posts or departments to dispose of, or otherwise affect the ownership of, property held by any post or department in its own name, nor affect the right of such posts or departments to organize corporations under State laws for the purpose of caring for and disposing of such property.

SEC. 6. That the national encampment may, by resolution, provide for the disposition and future ownership of its property and archives, and may declare the event in which such disposition shall become effective and such ownership vested, and a duly authenticated copy of such resolution shall be filed in the office of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. Upon the happening of the event thus declared, and upon the filing of a petition in said supreme court reciting said facts, said court shall take jurisdiction thereof, and upon due proof being made the court shall enter a decree which shall be effectual to vest title and ownership in accordance with the provisions of such resolution.

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

Page 1, lines 7 and 8, strike out the following: "in the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

Page 2, lines 7 and 8, substitute period for comma after the word "organization" in line 7, and strike out "as such purposes are avowed and declared in its rules and regulations," appearing in said lines 7 and 8.

Insert on page 2, at the end of section 1, and before section 2, a new section, as follows, to be known as section 2:

"SEC. 2. The object and purpose of this corporation shall be to perpetuate the name of 'the Grand Army of the Republic,' and to preserve in corporate form said organization as now and heretofore maintained and conducted, and to thus provide and continue an agency and instrumentality through and by which its members, for and during the remainder of their natural lives, may assemble and meet for the promotion of comradeship and social intercourse. The corporation shall not at any time engage in any business for pecuniary profit and gain.

"The principal office of this corporation shall be kept and maintained in the city of Washington, D. C., but annual or other meetings of its governing body and members may be held in any State or Territory of the Union, and the corporation shall have the power to possess and hold property needful or desirable for its objects and purposes anywhere in the United States of any of its Territories or dependencies, consistently with the provisions of local laws pertaining thereto."

Page 2, line 24, substitute a period for the comma, after the word "encampment" and strike out: "and the meetings of said organization, whether for the transaction of business or otherwise, may be held at any place in the United States"; said language appearing in line 25, page 2, and lines 1 and 2, page 3.

Page 4, line 9, strike out the figure "2" and substitute therefor the figure "3."

Renumber sections 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the present bill, so that the same will be numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, respectively, to conform to inserted section 2, above mentioned.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CERTIFICATES OF CITIZENSHIP TO INDIANS.

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6355) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue certificates of citizenship to Indians.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. I make the point of order that this bill and the next one following have not been on the calendar three legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That point of order is sustained.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that we have no quorum present.

Mr. CURRY. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold it.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ROSENBLOOM, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 4807. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State highway commission of Louisiana to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across West Pearl River in the State of Louisiana;

H. R. 4808. An act granting the consent of Congress to the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Pearl River between St. Tammany Parish in Louisiana and Hancock County in Mississippi;

S. 2583. An act granting a franking privilege to Edith Bolling Wilson;

H. R. 584. An act to authorize the county of Multnomah, Oreg., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Willamette River in the city of Portland, Oreg., in the vicinity of present site of Sellwood Ferry;

H. R. 3265. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge between the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens in the city and State of New York; and

H. R. 3681. An act to authorize the building of a bridge across the Waccamaw River in South Carolina.

EXTENDING PROVISIONS OF CERTAIN LAWS TO THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4121) extending the provisions of certain laws to the Territory of Hawaii with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments. The bill passed the House unanimously, and last Thursday it passed the Senate with a few amendments, which do not change the provisions of the bill but simply clarify it. I have taken the matter up with the ranking minority member of the committee and it is agreeable to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill with the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title to the bill, as follows:

H. R. 4121. An act to extend the provisions of certain laws to the Territory of Hawaii.

The Senate amendments were read.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURRY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WATKINS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for one week on account of illness.

Mr. KVALE, by unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. WEEALD), was given leave of absence indefinitely on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 4, 1924, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

389. Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the legislative establishment of the United States providing $166,000 for the Capitol power plant and the Capitol Grounds (H. Doc. No. 212), was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. RANKIN: Committee on the Census. S. 2113. An act to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton," approved July 22, 1912; without amendment (Rept. No. 255). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FISH: Committee on Foreign Affairs. H. J. Res. 180. A joint resolution for the relief of the distressed and starving women and children of Germany; with amendments (Rept. No. 256). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HAWES: A bill (H. R. 7489) to amend the national prohibition act as supplemented to conform with the eighteenth constitutional amendment by permitting the use of alcoholic liquors for medicinal purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 7490) to amend the national prohibition act as supplemented to conform with the eighteenth constitutional amendment by limiting the prohibition to intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 7491) to amend the first subdivision of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," approved June 29, 1906; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. SABATH: A bill (H. R. 7492) to amend section 2 of the act relative to naturalization and citizenship of married women, approved September 22, 1922; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. WOOD: A bill (H. R. 7493) to authorize the consolidation and coordination of Government purchases, to enlarge the functions of the General Supply Committee, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WILLIAMSON: A bill (H. R. 7494) to amend an act creating the Custer State park game sanctuary, in the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. KING: A bill (H. R. 7495) to provide for a refund to veterans of the World War of certain sums deducted from their pay for allotments and insurance and to compensate such veterans in an amount equal to the additional allowance paid civilian employees of the United States during such war, and to the losses sustained upon the disposition of Liberty bonds purchased or subscribed for by veterans during such war; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HAWES: A bill (H. R. 7496) to provide complete adjusted compensation for veterans of the World War who sustained loss from any cause during service in the World War, and to equalize allowances made to civilian employees, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senate resumes the consideration of Senate bill 2250, the unfinished business, and the pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

REFUNDS OF INCOME TAXES.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in this morning's Washington Post there was published under the headline "Refunds of taxes" the names of a number of taxpayers to whom refunds had been made amounting to $123,992,820. The statement was given out by the Treasury Department and includes the refunds made during the year 1923. I ask unanimous consent that the list as it appears in the Washington Post may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be printed as requested.

The list is as follows:

REFUNDS OF TAXES IN 1923 TO 263,320 TOTAL $123,992,820—COVER ERRORS OF SEVERAL YEARS, SAY TREASURY OFFICIALS—EDWARD L. DOHENY RECEIVED $40,039—MORE THAN $1,000 TURNED BACK TO 10,152 PERSONS—MANY EXCEED $100,000.

[From the Washington Post, Tuesday, March 4, 1924.]

Refunds totaling $123,992,820.94 on tax payments were made by the Treasury in the fiscal year 1923, ending June 30, 1923, according to a report sent to the Ways and Means Committee by the department.

The refunds, which were made to 263,320 persons, covered payments for several years and were made on account of "illegal or erroneously collected taxes." The report showed 10,152 persons had received more than $1,000 in reimbursements.

Among those receiving refunds were Edward L. Doheny, Los Angeles, $40,039.04; Charles R. Crane, New York, $172,296.96; Cornelius Vanderbilt, 32 Nassau Street, New York, $57,971.69; Oliver Harriman, New York, $82,537.70; Joseph W. Moore Dry Goods Co., Memphis, Tenn., $143,269.84.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish in this connection to express the hope that the Secretary of the Treasury will in like manner give out a list of the refunds made by his department for the years 1922 and 1921. I think it is information that the Senate and the country should have.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether the refunds have been actually paid to the taxpayers?

Mr. McKELLAR. The article so states.

Mr. KING. Has an appropriation been made by Congress to compensate them?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know out of what appropriation they are paid, but I imagine out of deficiency appropriations. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is not present in the Chamber at this moment. I am quite sure he would know. I have had some correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury in the last few weeks in reference to refunds being made by his department, and I am delighted to know that he has published a list of refunds that are being made or have been made for the year 1923. As I said, I hope he will make public the refunds made for the years 1922 and 1921.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, may I state to the Senator from Tennessee that the refunds are made through appropriations contained in the deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Then the $123,000,000 will be paid through appropriations contained in the deficiency appropriation bill for this year, as the method of paying the refund is through a deficiency appropriation bill. How they appear in the receipts and disbursements of the Government as required under the constitutional provision I do not know. I have asked for that information and I hope the Secretary of the Treasury will soon give it to us. I shall then put it in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator in his investigation will make inquiry to ascertain the extent to which the refunds have been made in the case of oil properties. My information is that many of the oil companies have obtained, under the head of depletion and exhaustion, enormous credits which have materially reduced the taxes which they should have paid to the Government. I have asked in a resolution for information respecting this matter; but the Senator from Tennessee said he had some correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury, and I sincerely hope he will elicit information in regard to this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I have had that matter up also. There is no doubt about it that either large credits have been made in the matter of income-tax returns or refunds have been made by reason of depletion. I have not yet learned the facts, but I am quite sure they will come out whenever the refunds for 1921 and 1922 are published. I join with the Senator in hoping that we may get the information from the Secretary of the Treasury. It is information that the Senate ought to have, and I do not think it comes within the secrecy provision of the law as to income-tax returns. I am quite sure that it does not.

Mr. KING. I made some investigation in regard to the matter and learned that in some cases oil companies have claimed credits or deductions in the assessments which have been levied by the Government by reason of so-called depletion and by reason of the alleged loss in value of the property, as a result of which the Government has lost millions of dollars in taxes.

May I ask the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] whether the resolution which he has pending before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, calling for an investigation of the Internal Revenue Office, will be reported in the near future?

Mr. COUZENS. The chairman of the committee advised me yesterday that a majority of the committee had approved the amended resolution and they are ready to report it out.

Mr. McKELLAR. I happen to be a member of the committee, and I can say that the committee have authorized a favorable report upon the resolution submitted by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. KING. I submitted a resolution several months ago asking for an investigation of the tax situation in the Internal Revenue Bureau. We have a great deal of information, though perhaps some of it may be exaggerated, relative to the methods employed in allowing the large amounts to taxpayers referred to by the Senator from Tennessee.

There is also information to the effect that the evils to which I directed attention a moment ago in connection with oil companies are increasing. There is no court to pass upon the claims for refund of taxes. Claims involving millions of dollars are presented to officials of the Government, some of whom are mere clerks or subordinate employees, and legal questions of great importance are determined by these subordinate officials. It seems to me that the method of adjudicating upon these claims is archaic and unfair to the Government, and, perhaps, unfair to the claimants. We ought to provide some comprehensive judicial system for the determination of these questions whether of law or fact.

In order that we might have some accurate information as the basis for needed legislation, I offered a resolution some time ago, which is now pending before the Finance Committee, calling for an investigation of the Internal Revenue Bureau. The Senator from Michigan has recently offered a resolution, now before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, having, in the main, the same purposes covered by my resolution. I have conferred with the Senator from Michigan, and have suggested an amendment or two to his resolution. With such amendments, I hope the committee will report his resolution. I shall be entirely satisfied to have action taken upon his resolution if the Senate shall promptly act upon the same. Otherwise I shall press for the passage of my resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that I fully indorse the statements which he has made in reference to this matter. I merely wish to say to him and to other Senators who are interested in the subject that this whole matter may be corrected by simply inserting in the revenue bill, which is before the Finance Committee, a provision for publicity of tax returns under proper regulation. If such publicity is had, it will, in my judgment, cure all the ills concerning which the Senator from Utah has spoken, and in which statements I fully concur.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was about to ask the Senator from Tennessee upon what principle or theory is the list of refunds made to income-tax payers made public when the original payments are kept secret?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not understand it. I was, however, very greatly gratified to see the list of refunds published in the morning newspapers. It is information which I have written a number of times to the Secretary of the Treasury to obtain, but he has not as yet sent it to me.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If a list of refunds may be made public, why should not the original returns be made public?

Mr. McKELLAR. Because though the Congress of the United States has passed a law which requires that such returns shall be public property only the President and the Secretary of the Treasury can make them public. It is a very unusual provision of law and it ought to be changed. When taxes are assessed locally there is the utmost publicity about the matter so that the taxpayers may see for themselves what taxes are paid. Why should income taxes be put upon any other basis? They ought to be published in like manner; the public ought to know whether income taxpayers are properly returning the incomes which they should return; and all the facts and circumstances about the subject should have the utmost and the widest publicity, both for the benefit of the Government and the people under the Government.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has rendered a very great service to the country, for the resolution which he submitted the other day is, I think, responsible for bringing out this statement from the Secretary of the Treasury. I have in mind another resolution on this subject which will be submitted later, but I do not now care to indicate the nature of that resolution. However, it relates to the refund of taxes. I observe in this list of refunds that Mr. Doheny has had refunded to him $40,000 by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is a goodly sum.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me at that point?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to my friend from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator should also state that very soon after the refund was made the clerk who passed on the refund entered Mr. Doheny's employment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend for the suggestion which he has made, that the clerk formerly in the Government service who passed on the refund which resulted in returning to Mr. Doheny $40,000 is now employed by Mr. Doheny. Forty thousand dollars, Mr. President, is a goodly sum to some people. It will enable Mr. Doheny to spend his time in Washington employing lawyers to write articles for him to be published in the Washington Post, the administration newspaper of this city. That $40,000 will take care of a good deal of Mr. Doheny's expenses.

On yesterday in this administration newspaper appeared an article by Mr. Doheny's lawyer—I think his lawyer wrote the article, and he has a very fine lawyer, one of the ablest in the country—again lecturing Democratic Senators. Not long ago the Democrats of California read him out of the party. Mr. Doheny has been consorting with the Republican Party for quite a while. He is out of the Democratic Party entirely and for good, and we find him in the Capital of the Nation urging support of the Republican administration.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do.

Mr. ODDIE. I should like to ask the Senator if he is aware of the fact that Mr. Doheny has put his agent in his place?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not hear what the Senator is saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. ODDIE. I should like to ask the Senator if he is aware that Mr. Doheny has appointed his special counsel as his agent in his place in California?

Mr. HEFLIN. In his place where?

Mr. ODDIE. On the Democratic central committee of California.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can not permit the statement made by the Senator from Nevada to pass without notice. Undoubtedly he is referring to Hon. Gavin McNab, and in so doing the Senator from Nevada is doing a grave injustice to Mr. McNab, as the Senator must know. Mr. McNab is one of the ablest lawyers in the United States and one of the most honorable and public-spirited residents of California. He is a man of the highest integrity and of commanding ability. He is fearless and independent. He is not the political agent of Mr. Doheny or of any other person. He was, as I am told, employed by Mr. Doheny to accompany him to Washington, and appeared with Mr. Doheny before the Senate committee which was investigating the oil leases. Evidently his employment was of service to the country, because Doheny then told of the payment to Mr. Fall and offered to return the leased oil lands. In that Mr. McNab as his counsel rendered a public service and discharged his duty as an honorable lawyer. When the Senator says or infers that Mr. McNab is the agent of Mr. Doheny or that Mr. Doheny could appoint him in his stead to attend a convention, the Senator must know that he is making a charge—a most serious and unfounded one—against an honorable and an upright man.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator. I want to give him an opportunity to emerge from this embarrassing predicament if he can.

Mr. ODDIE. I will qualify my previous statement by saying that the Democratic convention in California appointed Mr. McNab in Mr. Doheny's place.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not accept that statement as accurate. Mr. McNab has been for many years one of the leading, if not the leading, Democrat in the State of California. He was a Democrat before Mr. Doheny was known to be a member of that party, and in every convention and in all of the activities of the Democratic Party for years Gavin McNab has been an important figure. He is a fighting, militant Democrat, and neither Mr. Doheny nor anyone else could "appoint him as an agent" to represent them in the Democratic Party or elsewhere. Whatever position he has in the party he has earned by his fidelity to his party and by his devotion to Democratic principles.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Utah for his very just and satisfactory statement. I am sure that the Senator from Nevada, clever Senator that he is, would like to have something to say by way of rejoinder against the party that is crowding the Republican Party to the wall; but unless he has something with a better foundation than what he suggested here a moment ago he had better stay off of Doheny.

It is quite a different proposition, Mr. President, for an able and clean attorney who is a Democrat to be a member of the Democratic committee and for Doheny, who has been found here to be guilty of high crimes against his country, to be a member of such committee.

This man Doheny has become the mouthpiece of the Republican Party. Every now and then he gives out a statement and it is published in the Washington Post, which is the administration newspaper. I observe, Mr. President, that his statement of yesterday appears in big headlines on the front page of the Washington Post and it also appeared on the front page of other big Republican dailies throughout the country. Does any Senator here think that an ordinary private citizen, an honest man, a man of small means, could have his article carried over the country in the big daily newspapers on the front page as this was carried?

No, Mr. President; you would find it away back over among the advertisements.

Here he is in the Capital of the Nation, and he is scolding the Democrats, and he is saying that if it were not for the election coming on there would not be any investigation of the oil scandal. That is the strange and disgusting position that he takes.

Here is what he said:

> The election in November, not the legality of the oil leases, nor the benefit they are to the Government, is the sole factor now controlling the politicians who are conducting the so-called oil investigation.

Now, Mr. President, let us consider this man's concept of what a Senator's duty is. He arraigns the Senate, and says that this thing would not be going on but for the fact that an election is coming on; that there are not enough Senators in this body who are honest and who love justice and right well enough to pursue a thing because it is right to pursue it, to punish wrong because it is right to punish wrong. This man, with the low concept that he has of public duty, is now in the Capital of the Nation having pieces written and published throughout the country, assailing the Senate and calling on people to support his friend, the Republican administration. We find out every day why he is doing that.

This morning the press discloses that $40,000 has been handed over to him by the Treasury Department. A member of the Cabinet is good to Doheny to the extent of $40,000. He says Senators are neglecting their duty. Mr. President, what higher service can a Senator render to his country than to require honest conduct in public office? What higher service can he perform than to be alert, diligent, and honest in all the things that pertain to his work as a public servant? But Doheny says we are neglecting our duty—to do what? To play politics just before an election comes off.

Mr. President, I think it is part of my duty and part of the duty of other Senators here to bring out the facts regarding the most colossal crime and scandal that has come to light in this country in a hundred years; but this man, Doheny, says, "Why, it is not that. They are not faithful in the discharge of duty. They do not care anything about punishing those guilty of wrongdoing. They are simply playing politics"; and then what does he say in conclusion? He says:

> But when I get into the courts I expect to win. This will be disposed of as all other recent political prosecutions have been disposed of.

That is the substance of what he said.

Political prosecutions under what administration? Under the Republican administration. I challenge all the members of the Republican Party, here or elsewhere, to cite me to one millionaire who is guilty of crime who has been convicted and put behind prison bars during this Republican administration. Name just one. I challenge them to name to me one man high in the financial circles of Republican favorites who has been earnestly prosecuted by Republican officials. They go free, Mr. President, and we find the agents of these mighty interests not simply standing outside and telling governmental officials what to do; we find them on the inside carrying on their crooked work by the aid of Republican officials. We find Ed McLean is made an agent in the Department of Justice, this millionaire who seems to be the go-between for these big oil fellows on the side. We find him with a private wire running from Washington to Florida. We find him with the White House telegraph operator employed also to operate his private wire to Florida. We find him receiving messages from the Department of Justice telling him what is going on in the oil investigation here in Washington. We find a telegram sent to him by Major saying:

> I have seen the party at Wardman Park.

Meaning Fall, of course.

> I advise you to put in this private wire so as to have quick and easy access to the White House. Secretary Slemp is leaving for Florida tonight.

All in the same telegram.

Are not these significant things, Mr. President, and ought we not to lay them bare to the public? Whose Government is this? Are Senators to be criticized because they dare to bring on the floor of the Senate the scandalous doings of conscienceless men who seem to control this administration by reason of their immense wealth?

But this man Doheny says that the Senate is neglecting its duty, and that we have a lot of people here who ought not to be here. He says we have turned to be gum-shoe detectives. Well, we have to do our own detective work. Where do we get any aid from the Department of Justice? If we could not do this work how would we discover these many things that are going wrong about the Capital?

Mr. Doheny complains that the Senate has lost its dignity and high standing. Mr. President, time was when this body was regarded by many people as the rendezvous of privilege. Time was when the people had difficulty in having certain matters of moment discussed in the Senate. If certain big interests outside did not want them discussed, they were not seriously discussed in this Chamber. Time was when a question like this would have been stifled, choked to death, and buried in the Senate; but, thank God, the people of America are wide-awake now. They are sending Senators to this body who feel it their duty to discuss things that affect the vital life of this Nation. They feel that the people ought to be apprised of the things that constitute betrayal of public trust, of corrupt conduct on the part of Government officials.

I want to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that Macaulay said that this Republic would go down in the twentieth century. This is the twentieth century. Are we who are charged with the responsibility of safeguarding these institutions to remain silent, to fold our arms and permit this work of destruction to go on?

What is our duty? It is our duty to ask each day, "How fares the Republic?" It is our duty to say each day, "What am I doing to contribute to the strength and glory of the Republic?" It is our duty to do what we can to drive from public office every crook in the country and to support and uphold every honest man in office. That is our business.

Mr. President, if the time ever comes when Senators will come to this body or Members will go to the other branch of Congress and become the agents of certain crooked interests, just as a lawyer would represent his client, then the time is not far distant when we will have to consider seriously Macaulay's saying regarding the downfall of the Republic. Have any of you ever known of such bold and brazen betrayal of pulic trust and such corruption in official position as the oil-lease scandal discloses? Why, there is a newspaper story to the effect that the Attorney General himself, with Mr. Sinclair, went to the race track and they bet money for certain Cabinet members on race horses, and that the one Daugherty bet on lost; that later he turned over some money to Sinclair to bet, and that Sinclair came back with a bunch of money and turned it over to him, and he divided it out among those whose money he had bet, and said, "These are our winnings"; and then you talk about remaining silent! Remaining silent? I know that some do not want the people to know about these things; but we are bringing them out for the purpose of publicly condemning misconduct in office and in the hope that it will prevent public men in the future from being guilty of doing such things.

I remember, too, in that connection that it was along at the time of the race-track incident that Mr. Daugherty was buying stock in the Sinclair Oil Co. Oh, Mr. President, the whole thing smells to high heaven, and yet the Washington Post carries the articles of Doheny or his lawyer abusing the Senate, sitting right in the Capital of the Nation, right under the eyes of the President, condemning, scolding, excoriating the Senate that has dared to employ lawyers to go and recover for the Government hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property taken from it through the practice of fraud and corruption.

He is coming out in the Washington administration paper and urging the people to stand up for this oil-soaked administration.

Of course, Mr. Doheny does not want these things discussed. He probably would hate to have it said that a Senator stated on the floor of the Senate that he received a note in the committee room from one of the Republican Senators who is a member of this investigating committee, and that when it was called for he took from his pocket a hundred pieces of it, torn into tatters so that nobody could read it, and suggested to them to read that if they could. Of course, he does not want these things to come out. But, Mr. President, I say again I thank God that there are Senators in this body who do not take orders from crooked interests, who do not bow the knee to the Baal of the money power!

I know that Doheny is a big man in a financial way. He controls millions and millions of dollars. He has reached out in every direction to try to get under his control some of the strongest men in the Nation. I know all that. I know that he has the columns of this paper open to him, as well as many others in the country, to help hamper and hinder those who are fighting to have a genuine house cleaning at Washington. I know that; but, Mr. President, that does not relieve me of my duty, however unpleasant it is; and it is unpleasant to have to go into things that throw a cloud in the direction of Senators, some of them, who seem to be involved in this matter. These things are not pleasant; but, as I said the other day, a soldier does not shrink from his duty because it is unpleasant. There are many things we must do that are unpleasant. Nevertheless, it is our duty to do it.

Mr. President, Mr. Doheny intimates very strongly that he expects to win this suit. He is not satisfied with the findings of the Senate. We are the representatives of the people and fresh from the people. He would rather risk his case with some judge who has been on the bench for a long time. We have a great many learned judges—good judges, clean judges—they are men who would not stoop to do an unjust or a crooked thing; yet we have judges on the Federal bench in the country, before whom I would not be willing to have the Government's case tried. I think I know two who are going to be involved in an investigation that is going to come out soon. They are not all what they should be. They are not all free from the contaminating influence of predatory interests, and I want to say here now, in my place as one legislator, that whoever tries this case ought to try it fairly and honestly, as I hope and believe it will be tried. The eyes of the Senate will be on that court; the eyes of the country will be on that court, wherever it is.

Mr. Doheny expresses great confidence in the outcome of this controversy. I expect the Government to win the suit. Because of the fraud and corruption involved, I would expect that the court would set this lease aside. I would expect—because Doheny has been convicted of bribing Fall—that they would declare that the leases are null and void; and I would expect, on the ground of good public policy, that a court would preserve the oil domain of the Nation to the Nation for use in the future, maybe some time in the hour of the country's grave peril.

I do not know by what authority Doheny has these articles published in the administration paper. I think, as I said before, his lawyer is writing them. He is trying to lug into these columns many unsupported statements—ridiculous statements—regarding what the law is upon the subject of granting oil leases.

Mr. President, one other thing and I will close. Some time ago I said in the Senate that "G. O. P." had been interpreted to mean "going out of power," and that a gentleman in my State had written me a letter saying that it stood for "Great Oil Party." I now have a letter from a gentleman in Delaware suggesting to me that he had seen what I said regarding G. O. P. heretofore, and he said the most appropriate name he could find for it now is the "Grafters' Oil Party." Grafters' Oil Party—G. O. P.; and Doheny is the mouthpiece of the Grafters' Oil Party. Doheny is here in the Capital. The battle cry of the Republican Party has become, "If you want dough, go to Doheny." They say Fall is the man who put dough in Doheny; that he is the man who put sin in Sinclair; and he is the man who put a dent in Denby.

I want to read for the edification of all the disciples of Doheny, either here or elsewhere, a poem written in the State of New Mexico, the State of ex-Secretary Fall. It is entitled "The Golden Fleece," and reads:

THE GOLDEN FLEECE.

Abou Dough Heenie (may his tribe increase)!
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
A Senator writing in a book of gold.
Enormous wealth had made Dough Heenie bold;
And to the Senator in his room he said:
"What writest thou?" The statesman raised his head,
And with a look which made Abou boil
Answered, "The names of those who seek for oil!"
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "We will see!"
Replied the Senator; but Abou Dough cheerily
Responded in a still and softer tone,
"Write me as one who loves to make a loan."
The Senator wrote and vanished. The next day
He came again—it looked like CARAWAY—
And showed the names of those whom Fall liked best,
And lo! Dough Heenie's name led all the rest.

That poem, Mr. President, comes from the State of New Mexico, from whence Mr. Fall hails. Fall is the man who has the finger prints of slime and corruption all over him, placed there by Doheny. Doheny is the man who had $40,000 passed back to him by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury who is fathering a tax bill that lifts the taxes from the mighty rich and lays them upon the backs of the poor.

Mr. President, the truth must come out, even if Doheny and those like him are offended when the Senate dares to expose crookedness and crime. This Government belongs to the public, and we, some of us, are the servants of the public.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall only take a moment. Hearing the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] quoting poetry, or verse, it occurred to me to read this, which was sent to me the other day. It is entitled "Mr. Vanderlip Says," and reads:

Absolute knowledge have I none,
But my aunt's washerwoman's sister's son
Heard a policeman on his beat
Say to a laborer on the street
That he had a letter just last week—
A letter which he did not seek—
From a Chinese merchant in Timbuctoo,
Who said that his brother in Cuba knew
Of an Indian chief in a Texas town,
Who got the dope from a circus clown,
That a man in Klondike had it straight
From a guy in a South American State,
That a wild man over in Borneo
Was told by a woman who claimed to know,
Of a well-known swell society rake,
Whose mother-in-law will undertake
To prove that her husband's sister's niece
Has stated plain in a printed piece
That she has a son who never comes home
Who knows all about the Teapot Dome.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I would suggest that Mr. Vanderlip, who is a Republican, now says that the President has called on Daugherty to resign, and he challenges anybody to call on him to state how he knows that.

AGRICULTURAL DIVERSIFICATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2250) to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war, and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. KING. I would like to have the amendment stated.

Mr. MOSES. What is the amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate as he may determine to be necessary and find available for increasing agricultural production until June 30, 1926, and to dispose of the same at the total cost to the Government, payable in advance. For carrying out the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations and to use such means and agencies of the Government as in his discretion he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate shall go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated and the proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate may be used, at the discretion of the President, until June 30, 1926, as a revolving fund for the purposes herein named.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think perhaps the Senator from Georgia will explain the necessity for this appropriation.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, several years ago Congress appropriated money for a revolving fund similar to this. The Government by doing this helped the farmers in the South and in the Middle West a great deal, saved them several million dollars, and did not lose anything. With the Norbeck bill, there is a danger of several million dollars being lost by the Government, but if my amendment is approved the Government will sell only for cash in advance and there is no risk whatever about it.

Calcium arsenate has gone up 300 per cent within two years. We can not make cotton in the South now without the use of fertilizers and calcium arsenate on account of the boll weevil. It is absolutely necessary that we have it. The crop will not be 10 per cent in some sections without its use.

The calcium arsenate monopoly has advanced the price about 300 per cent. If the President is given this authority, I doubt whether it will be necessary for the Government to use a dollar of the money. It may not be necessary. Certainly not very much of it will be used, but the effect of the appropriation will be to keep down the price of both calcium arsenate and sodium nitrate.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARRIS. I will be very glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. HARRISON. This amendment is drawn with the same provisions that were incorporated in a law passed heretofore?

Mr. HARRIS. Exactly.

Mr. HARRISON. It will do nothing more than was done at that time?

Mr. HARRIS. Nothing more; and at that time the Government did not lose one dollar. It is one of the few things the Government has ever done for the farmers where the Government did not lose money.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are to charge cash?

Mr. HARRIS. The farmers will pay cash in advance.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senate adopted a provision similar to this in March, 1923, did it not?

Mr. HARRIS. I think it was February.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senate has passed on this very proposition before?

Mr. HARRIS. There was not a vote against it. Last year the bill was introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. It was drawn by him, and it was amended on my motion to include calcium arsenate. The Senator's bill provided only for the sodium nitrate. In my judgment, this will help the farmers of the South and save them ten or fifteen million dollars, and will not cost the Government one cent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask if the amendment as read provides for the purchase of nitrate of soda, as well as calcium arsenate?

Mr. HARRIS. It does; it provides for both nitrate of soda and calcium arsenate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. HARRIS. I have.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am aware that at a previous session the Senate passed a joint resolution or bill to the same effect practically as the one now before us, but I think it is important that the Senate should understand that the situation to-day bears no resemblance to that of a few months or a couple of years ago. My information is to the effect that there is plenty of nitrate of soda now on hand in the United States to meet the needs of the season of planting just about to open; furthermore, that the price of nitrate of soda laid down at American ports to-day is only 10 cents a hundred pounds higher than it was in 1914.

What is the object of the Government of the United States spending $10,000,000 to charter ships to go to Chile and load the nitrate there at a price fixed in Chile by the miners of nitrate, who are formed into an ironclad association, bring it to our own ports, and meet here an entire sufficiency of supply for this year? I understand there are about 350,000 tons here.

Mr. HARRIS. As I said, I doubt if the Government will spend one dollar of this appropriation. I think the Senator is correct in stating there is plenty of sodium nitrate now in this country, but if the bill passes the farmers will get it at a low price. There is objection to the bill. Importers who handle this product in New York came down to see me and opposed the bill. The fertilizer manufactories are opposed to the bill, but I do not think that is any reason why we should not help the farmers get fertilizer at a lower price. It is almost impossible for many of the farmers in my State to get a fertilizer at any price because of the financial condition they are in. The bill will, I am sure, hold down the price of fertilizers and calcium arsenate for every farmer in the South and in the West.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not understand how it is going to reduce the price to any considerable degree unless, of course, we establish the theory in America that the Government shall supply commercial articles at cost to meet the needs of a class of people which wants them. The fact of the matter is that the price of nitrate is lower in proportion than the price of any other thing used by the farmers to-day. It is only 10 cents a hundred pounds higher than it was in 1914. In other words, there has been scarcely any increase. The Senator from Georgia says it will hold down the price to the farmer in the matter of the fertilizer, but I call attention to the fact that the entire fertilizer industry is having an exceedingly difficult time getting along at all. In fact, one of the greatest fertilizer plants in this country and in the world went into the hands of a receiver only yesterday.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I would like to say to the Senator from New York that nitrate of sodium finds its only competitor in America in sulphate of ammonia or ammonium sulphate. Ammonium sulphate carries a duty under the tariff act of $5 per ton. It is the only ingredient used in commercial fertilizer that is taxed under the present tariff act. Notwithstanding this bar of $5 per ton duty on ammonium sulphate, Chilean nitrate does come in and comes over the bar of the $5 tariff. It may not be any justification for the amendment or for the provision contained in the amendment of my colleague, but since the Government is taxing the chief element used in his fertilizer to the extent of $5 per ton, it might help make it up to the farmer by creating a revolving fund and providing the cash with which to buy it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would seem to me the fact that Chilean nitrate comes in here in the way it does shows that it is the cheaper product. If the farmer were suffering in any way in relation to the commercial fertilizer which he uses, he certainly is not suffering from the price on Chilean nitrate. The fact is the price is only 10 cents a hundred pounds higher than it was in 1914.

Mr. GEORGE. That is quite true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why is it necessary for the Government to come to the rescue of the farmers in relation to Chilean nitrate? There is no emergency. There is plenty of it here. There is plenty of it on its way. No one in the United States, importer or farmer, has the slightest control over the price of Chilean nitrate. It is fixed in Chile by the association of the producers of nitrate, and the same price is quoted in Chile to every person who goes there to buy, so much per ton or per hundred pounds. The charges that are added are the freight from Chile to our ports and, as I am informed, an unusually low set of charges in the matter of storage and handling and distribution in this country.

Mr. GEORGE. The reason why I rose was that I think the Senator is somewhat wrong in saying the price is fixed entirely in Chile. The only competitor of Chilean nitrate is the ammonium sulphate to which I have called attention, and the duty on that particular ingredient, which is one of the very important elements in the manufacture of commercial fertilizer, enables the sale of Chilean nitrate in this country or makes it necessary for it to be sold in this country at a higher price than it otherwise probably would carry. I think really that the farmer would be more benefited if the $5 per ton duty upon sulphate of ammonia were removed, because I think that would result in a further reduction of the Chilean nitrate price.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, that is an entirely different question. I assume the duty on ammonium sulphate was imposed in an effort to build up in this country an industry which would take the place of the Chilean nitrate industry in the event this country got into difficulties, as it did during the recent war. Senators will recollect very well that there was a very great emergency confronting agriculture in the United States as soon as the war interrupted, in part at least, the supply of Chilean nitrate, and the price of commercial fertilizer went bounding upward, and necessarily so. The supply having been so severely curtailed—that is, the supply of the most important ingredient—the price rose. The $5 tariff per ton on ammonium sulphate was put on in an endeavor to build up in this country an industry which, in part at least, would take the place of the Chilean supply.

But now we are in the piping times of peace. There is plenty of Chilean nitrate in the country. That is admitted. We have no control over the price of the raw material, because that is fixed in Chile. The price is only 10 cents a hundred pounds higher than it was in 1914. There is no emergency whatsoever facing the country. Yet the amendment proposes to take $10,000,000 out of the Federal Treasury and embark the Government of the United States into an undertaking to charter vessels to go to Chile at Government expense and purchase Chilean nitrate at the same price that private individuals would have to pay—for there is no distinction made between private and public purchasers—bring it back to the United States at Government expense, land it at our ports, put it in storage, distribute it to fertilizer manufacturers, figure out the cost of the entire operation, and say finally to the farmer that he will get his Chilean nitrate at cost. It seems to me there is nothing in the present situation that warrants such an undertaking.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the Senator may be right when he says there is more nitrate in this country than is needed. He is right in saying that the wholesale price is fixed in Chile. But the Government will not spend any of this money unless those who hold the supply of nitrates in this country try to put such a profit on it that it will make the fertilizer cost the farmer more than it ought to. If the people who hold all this nitrate are willing to take a fair price on it, of course the Government is not going to have to spend a dollar.

We enacted a tax law last year to help the manufacturers of the country. They are not in the financial distress in which the farmers find themselves. There are no manufacturers that we taxed the people to give help to last year who are in the condition which the farmers are to-day, and yet we did not fix the tariff for only the manufacturers who were in distress, we raised the tariff duty to help all of them. Our farmers are in great distress. In my section at least a third of the farmers lost money last year. There is a large number of those who really lost their farms because of their condition. If the Senator from New York understood conditions he would be the last man to oppose the measure, because there is not a fairer man in the Senate than is the Senator from New York. He would not oppose the measure if he understood the real condition of the farmers in my State.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the Senate unduly in the matter. I understand many farmers in the Southern States encountered very grave difficulties during the last cotton season, but the difficulties did not arise in the slightest degree as a result of shortage of nitrates, nor as the result of the low price of cotton per pound. Cotton has been selling for months at between 23 and 30 cents a pound. The trouble was the boll weevil that reduced the quantity of cotton produced. The trouble was not the fertilizer, because there was plenty of it.

If the amendment is adopted no fertilizer can be purchased by the United States Government after its passage and delivered to the farmers in time to be of any use whatsoever in the year 1924. It takes 60 days to send a vessel to Chile and load her and to bring her back and unload her, and when that 60-day period has elapsed we will simply have doubled the quantity of fertilizer in the country, and the Government will be compelled to sell it at cost. The market would be flooded as a result.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator is right about this year, but he has not read the amendment carefully. The amendment contains exactly the same date that is contained in the Norbeck bill, to wit, June 30, 1926, and it will help us next year and the year after.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is there any evidence to the effect that help will be needed next year with the nitrates?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from New York spoke of the boll weevil and the price of cotton in the South. If cotton were 30 cents or 50 cents or $1 a pound and the boll weevil took it all, it would not help the farmer. That is the condition of at least a third of my people to-day. The bill includes an appropriation for calcium arsenate to combat the boll weevil, and that is the only poison we have found in the South that would get rid of the boll weevil. Every section of the country is interested in this matter.

The other countries of the world are going to raise much of the cotton now produced in this country if the price remains so high. If our farmers can not raise cotton at a lower price in some way where it has been destroyed by the boll weevil, many of our people are going out of the cotton-producing business and other countries are going into it, and they will take from this country a large amount of the production of cotton. They are already increasing their yield. If the farmer could raise cotton at as low expense as he could formerly, he might sell it at a lower price and make a profit and there would not now be such a shortage of cotton.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of the Senator from New York, as well as of the Senator from Georgia, to an error as to any benefit which might accrue to the farmer from the importation of soda within the next 60 or 90 days. Soda is rarely used as a primary or initial fertilizer in the planting of a crop. Its great value is in what is known as top dressing. It is perhaps the quickest and most powerful plant stimulant known to agriculture. Neither the sulphate of ammonia nor the ammonia derived from cottonseed meal or even from the cyanamid from the Niagara plant, where they have the nitrogen fixed from the air, has the peculiar effect of the nitrate of soda. It has revolutionized agriculture in the South.

We have a sandy soil and the danger of leaching or the actual leaching of the artificial fertilizers put in the soil is tremendous. So that even when we went to great expense in buying fertilizer to put under the different crops when growing, the friability of the soil and the excess rainfall in our section caused it to leach out, so that we lost perhaps the greater percentage of that which we had put in as fertilizer. If it were attempted to use the coarser forms of fertilizer as a top dressing, there would also be loss, for the reason that they are too slow in their action when applied later, during the growing period of the crop. However, one may plant an oat crop in the South on very poor soil, and if there is enough plant food in the soil to keep the "stand," as we call it, alive until spring, and then the crop is top dressed with nitrate of soda it has been known to double the yield of grain. That is its effect when applied to the small grains.

If applied to corn just before the ear begins to form, even though the stalk is very small, it will double and, in many instances, has been known to treble the yield of corn. I do not think I shall strain the faith of my colleagues in my veracity when I state that my State of South Carolina, which was perhaps one of the lowest in its average yield per acre of corn, yet holds the record yield of corn, having in a prize contest produced 235 bushels of corn as it came from the field on a single acre of upland. That phenomenal yield was produced largely because of the application of this wonderful plant stimulant or plant food.

With reference to the increase of the use of nitrate of soda since it was first tentatively tried some 30 or 35 years ago, the results of its application in the Atlantic coastal plain south of the Potomac River and east of the Alleghenies will indicate just what a revolution this particular ingredient has brought about not only in the yield per acre but also in the stimulation of interest in the farm. I dare say there is not an article in all the category of fertilizer ingredients which means as much to the farming interests of the South as does this particular ingredient.

I have not been advised as to the cost this year at the ship side of nitrate of soda in Chile. Perhaps the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has investigated the matter and is possessed of that information. I do not think, however, the price is uniform in Chile. The export duty by the Chilean Government is uniform. The fact is that the Chilean Government practically derives its revenue from its export duty on this ingredient.

The conditions which now confront us are not similar to those which existed at the time I asked the Senate to pass a resolution identical with the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Georgia. That resolution was passed, and it involved the saving of millions of dollars to the farmers. As the Senator from Georgia suggests, the Government not only did not lose a dollar, but, according to advices from the Agricultural Department, which had the distribution of the fertilizer in hand, they overestimated their overhead charges—that is, what it would cost to employ certain agents of the Government to distribute the nitrate of soda—by about $60,000, which the Government received in excess of what it cost to bring the fertilizer in and to distribute it. Understanding the fertilizer business as I do, and as I have been compelled to do during all my life, I can not see why there should be any objection to this proposition. If the Government has the facilities—and I presume we have them in the shape of certain vessels which we own——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator realize the cost which would be imposed upon the Government if it took some of the Shipping Board vessels which have been moored in our rivers for 18 months or 2 years and put them in shape to go to Chile in order to get the nitrates? It would be prohibitive.

Mr. SMITH. I presume that the Senator from Georgia who proposed the amendment does not contemplate that the Government shall lose any money by the operation. Therefore, if the Government, under the amendment, should find that the cost of Government operation would be greater than through private individuals, of course the amendment would not compel the Government to do the work.

The point I am making is this: All of us who have had any experience at all with commercial fertilizer know that its cost is very high. Senators will understand there is a radical difference between what is known as the manipulated fertilizer—that is, where certain fertilizing ingredients are compounded and sold as a complete fertilizer—and fertilizer such as nitrate of soda. All fertilizer plants use fertilizer in its prepared form for the major part of their business.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. My amendment provides that the Government is—

> To dispose of the same at the total cost to the Government, payable in advance.

Every cost is to be included.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia is identical with the resolution which I introduced during the World War.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment is like the joint resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina, as I stated in the beginning, except that it includes calcium arsenate now.

Mr. SMITH. What I wish to state is that no manipulation whatever, save by the evaporating vats in Chile, is needed for the preparation of the nitrate of soda; or, I will put my statement in another form and say that no kind of a manipulation is needed after the soda is delivered by the Chilean mines at the ship's side in Chile. The form in which it is then received on shipboard is identically the form in which I use it on my farm.

The only question involved here is, What is the margin of the profit of the private importers, the parties who buy this stuff and bring it to the United States and sell it? Of course, they are going to have a profit. This commodity is used extensively in the manipulated fertilizers as a basis of their ammonia. They also use fish scrap; they use sulphate of ammonia; they use cottonseed meal, and they use a form of tankage, all of which have a greater or less per cent of ammonia. They use those substances with phosphoric acid and potash and make what is called a "balanced" fertilizer, but even in that form the soda content, or the ammonia content, is a costly one. Phosphate is abundant. Since the termination of the war potash has been coming in from Germany almost as freely as it came in before the war. So that the one element in the production of the crops of the South which is costly to the farmer is the element of ammonia. The others are negligible. Anything that will tend to lessen the cost of his fertilizer tends to increase the yield per acre of his crop and as a result tend to lower the cost of living, for the reason——

Mr. WADSWORTH rose.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will bear with me a moment—for the reason that the farmer has no way in the world of carrying on to another the cost of his production, and just as in proportion as that production becomes unprofitable is he going to lessen his crop, and just in proportion as the cost of production becomes expensive it will be reflected, as a matter of course, if under no other law under the law of supply and demand; in the higher cost of living. We ought by all means within our power to encourage the production of those ingredients which are essential with due regard to as great profit as the farmer may obtain.

I will go further, Mr. President, and say that in the present order of things when practically every other industry in this country is organized it is the logic of the circumstances in which modern life finds itself. I daresay that there is not an article of ordinary use in any of the stores of the city of Washington or in any other city in America that is not only controlled by a combination which produces it but also the territory in which it is distributed is controlled and the price of it is fixed by that organization. We speak of competition, but under capitalistic production competition is an impossibility as we knew competition before we had the forces for manufacturing that we now have. Anyone who will take the time to study that last remark or the basis upon which it is made will realize that under the forms of capitalistic production we can not have competition. We can not have competition between the railroads of this country; we can not have competition between the manufacturing industries of this country. The things which are necessary to equip the factories are standardized by virtue of the operation of the same law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator says we can not have competition in the manufacturing business?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is an extraordinary statement in view of the well-known fact that price cutting is a common thing as between manufacturers.

Mr. SMITH. Price cutting, Mr. President, as between manufacturers can only be possible where the difference between the cost of production and the selling price has reached such a degree that they can compete. The Senator knows that the equipment of all factories in a particular line costs practically the same; wages are practically the same; the capital invested per unit of output is the same, and, if competition gets down to the point where the cost of production has been reached, then the only way to meet expenses is to go into capital and the moment that is done the plant ceases to operate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from South Carolina deny that the southern cotton mills compete with the New England mills?

Mr. SMITH. The southern cotton mills compete with the New England mills by virtue of a natural law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not asking the reason, but do they not compete? Do they pay the same labor wages as the New England mills?

Mr. SMITH. Practically the same.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator sure of that?

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator from New York will look at the reports, he will see that they are practically the same.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Are the hours of labor the same?

Mr. SMITH. The hours of labor are practically the same.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is news to me.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will investigate the matter, he will find that they are practically the same.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not denouncing the industry at all, but am merely calling attention to the fact that the Senator is making a very broad statement here when he says that there is no competition in the manufacturing business.

Mr. SMITH. I think I can sustain it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have seen some competition in skillfulness of management which the Senator has not touched upon.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the keenest and most important competition of all.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I admit that, and I will answer that suggestion.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, there has been in recent years such a complete departure from all the old, time-honored principles of American government that I am just a little desirous of finding my bearings. I should like to ask the Senator a single question. Is he a state socialist?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have not the time to answer any question of that kind, nor should a conclusion of that sort be deduced from what I have said.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator says there can be no competition in railroad operation, there can be no competition in commerce, there can be no competition in manufacturing enterprise. It seems to me it follows, as a necessary corollary from that, that there is nothing that can be done except to resort to state socialism.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, every man admits that in the management of our manufacturing industries in this country it will be found that those that are manufacturing have practically identically the same overhead charges. The cost of the goods as placed upon the market is the same, based upon the fact that capitalistic production can not compete as natural production is forced to compete. Mr. Morrison, one of the great economists of England, said in the very beginning of railroad operation that being monopolistic in its nature, having practically the same cost of construction and practically the same cost of upkeep, in its very nature competition there was impossible. I shall take occasion to show, and I think if time permitted I could show now, as the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] suggests, that where skill and thrift and economy are practiced, all of those can be accounted for to a negligible per cent; but when we take the cost of wages, fixed now by the hour, fixed now by the ordinary, uniform price that labor obtains, the standardization of the material out of which the plant is built, the markets in which the products are sold, the uniformity of the price of all manufactured goods throughout the country establishes the fact that the statement I made is practically correct. There is no competition possible in capitalistic production as we know it in the ordinary production. Therefore, until this Government by the proper legislation has brought about, for those who produce the raw materials of this country, a condition where they can meet the fixed, almost inflexible prices of the things that they have to buy, agriculture will stay where it is now. Every overhead charge of all the things that the farmer has to buy is absorbed in the price he has to pay, while from all that he has to sell has to be subtracted the price of all that he has to buy in producing it. So that we shall have to revolutionize our system of financing the farmer, and recognize the radical difference between artificial production, namely, manufacturing, and natural production, namely, the products of the field; and it is not, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] would indicate, State socialism for us to provide, by Federal enactment, means that will enable the farmer to better his condition, any more than for us to turn over to the national banks of this country the sole regulation of the circulating medium, and not allow the several States as well as the Federal Government to fix the amount of the very lifeblood of commerce.

Therefore, every help that can be extended should be extended, especially in view of the fact that in the case of this ingredient that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is attempting to aid, I do not see why there should be any radical objection. I frankly admit that the need for it does not exist as acutely to-day as it did at the time of the former introduction of the bill during the war; but I do say that the condition of the farmers in the South is no different from that of the farmers in other parts of the country. There may be some little differences in degree, perhaps, but they are all practically insolvent by virtue of two radically different things—in the West, overproduction; in the South, underproduction.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. The last statement of the Senator seems to me to be just a little inconsistent with a statement in the last report of the Department of Commerce. It says that the total value of the assessed property of the State of Virginia has exactly doubled in the last 10 years.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes; Mr. President.

Mr. BRUCE. That does not look like insolvency to me.

Mr. SMITH. If I were 20 feet down in a hole, and the hole were filled up with a deadly gas, and some one were to pull me up 10 feet, and I were not out of the gas, I would be in just about as bad a fix as if I were at the bottom. The value of their property may have increased, but they are still very far from solvent. That is the condition in my State. We were not as badly off in 1923 as we were in 1921, but we still are not out of debt, and there does not seem to be very much hope of our getting out of debt when the markets can be raided by those who do not know a wheat field from a broomstraw field, nor a cotton stalk from a jimson weed; and yet to-day they are absolutely controlling the price of the product produced by those upon whom we are dependent for our food and our clothing.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just once more?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I also saw a statement a few days ago to the effect that it was computed that within the next six years the State of North Carolina will have exhausted all of its potential water power for manufacturing, and that consequently some of the people of North Carolina were considerably concerned at the idea of the Muscle Shoals project diverting a portion of their manufacturing power. That too, does not look like insolvency to me.

Mr. SMITH. So far as the water power in North Carolina is concerned, I guess it is like it is in my State, controlled by private concerns who are manufacturing the raw material out of which the farmer is hoping to get something; but the difference between the price at which he sells his product and the price at which he buys the manufactured product is what is making possible the rapid development of water power in North Carolina. Of course it is in the hands of corporations. I have no quarrel with them. It is their duty to make all the money they can; but I do maintain that under the condition that exists in this country, by virtue of the great number of the farms and by virtue of the fact that it is impossible for the farmers to organize as other business organizes, the Government should recognize that fact and do all that legitimately may be done to bring about a condition where the farmer will be more or less assured of a fair return upon the things that he produces.

I have been a Member of this body 15 years, and I have seen the manufacturers of this country come and ask us to pass Federal legislation that not only would shut out the competition of foreign countries but would measure the difference between what the manufacturer would have to pay his laborers here and what the foreigner would have to pay his laborers, throwing the strong arm of the Government around him and shutting out competition in order to give him the American field for his exploitation. Everyone knew that the farmer could not enjoy the benefits of that, for the reason that unless the farmers were so organized as to handle their own output so that if they had a surplus they could dictate the price of the product they sold in America, and then have their surplus shipped out and meet world competition, the tariff was a dead letter to them for this reason: We put a tariff on wheat. It did the farmers practically no good. Why? Because the man that set the price of the wheat and bought the wheat was the man that exported the wheat and sold it to the domestic mill. The consequence was that the domestic price was the world's competitive price. Now, suppose the farmers had been organized sufficiently to control their output. They would have sold the domestic wheat at just the level of the tariff. They would have fixed the price, and they would have fixed it as high as the tariff, and what they exported would have been exported to meet the world's production.

We have here a bill, known as the McNary-Haugen bill, which says to the Government: "You assume the rôle of the unified buyer and seller, and you buy this wheat until you have bought up enough of it so that the purchasing power of the wheat dollar will measure up to the purchasing power of the dollar of the manufacturer who produces the things the farmer has to buy." In other words, it is tantamount to saying to the Government: "You stand in the place of an organized buying and selling movement until you get the domestic price up to the level of the tariff, and then distribute the export at the price of the world competition."

That bill, I understand, is indorsed by the present administration. If I am in error, perhaps some one who knows the situation will correct me; but the principle involved, that the surplus shall be bought up by the Government until the domestic price reaches the level of the tariff price and then the surplus shall be sold abroad, recognizes the fact that the farmer can not do it.

He has not the means to do it. He has not the organization to do it. Therefore the Government steps in and says, "We recognize the condition brought about by organized production and the tariff, and in decency we will meet it by assuming the rôle of an organized buyer and seller, and enable you to enjoy the benefits of the tariff."

I surmise that if the Government had assumed that rôle in reference to all the products of this country produced by the farmers, we would not have had such wonderful adherence to the principle of the protective tariff as we now have; but that goes to illustrate the point I am making, that the farmer is compelled to buy in a market where the price of the thing he buys is fixed by the seller, and then has to sell his product in a market where the price of the thing he sells is fixed by the buyer. That is the condition that confronts the country; hence, I presume, it was the reason why the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] introduced this measure.

I will state frankly that I do not think the necessity for the passage of the bill is anywhere near as great now as it was when it was first introduced; but in view of the fact that not a pound of this material is produced in America, not a pound—that which is available for us is a natural product found alone in Chile—if the Government, by virtue of its activity, can find a means of saving something to the farmer in order to enable him to meet the terrible conditions that now confront him, I do not see why it may not be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I indicated a few moments ago that I did not intend to keep the Senate longer in this discussion, but some of the observations made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are so extraordinary, to my view, that perhaps I will be forgiven if I make some comment in reply.

The Senator from South Carolina proceeds on the assumption, apparently, in the discussion of this entire agricultural problem, that the price of everything produced by the farmer is controlled arbitrarily by somebody else, some association or group of powerful individuals or corporations, generally never described or identified, remote and mysterious, but nevertheless all powerful. If that were true, cotton would not be selling at 30 cents a pound, because the organized buyer would not pay that much for it. He would insist upon a lower price. The very condition of the cotton market illustrates the utter fallacy of the statement that the buyer controls in every case the price of a great staple.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. May I call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that the recent advance in the price of tobacco is quite marked in southern Virginia and North Carolina, and I believe that there is a considerable amount of tobacco raised in South Carolina, too.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the statements made by the Senator from South Carolina are correct, the price of no farm product would ever go up. I have been in the business as a serious undertaking long enough to know that the prices of agricultural products vary every day in the year, and that no one has complete control over them.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from New York is setting up conditions of argument which I myself did not state. I did not say that any one man or any one corporation or any number of men control the price of the things the farmer sold, but what I did say was this: That the farmer had no say in the price of the thing he sold. The Senator will not deny that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, Mr. President; I deny it in part.

Mr. SMITH. To what extent?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I do not want to be too much of an interloper, but I would like to ask just one other question of the Senator from South Carolina. Does he or does he not attribute the rise in the price of tobacco grown in southern Virginia and North Carolina and South Carolina to the farmers' cooperative marketing association? It seems to me that this enhancement in the price of tobacco was a distinct and unmistakable result brought about by the action of the farmers themselves.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator from New York will allow me, may I ask the Senator from Maryland if he thinks the price was affected by cooperative marketing?

Mr. BRUCE. I think so, unquestionably. I grow a considerable amount of tobacco on my own plantation, and I think that the rise in the price of tobacco in the last year has been due to the marketing association formed by the southern farmer. That is the impression of my neighbors, as well as of myself.

Mr. SMITH. I heartily agree with the Senator. I think that has increased the price, and that is exactly in keeping with the argument I made, that organizations control the price. The Senator from New York will not deny that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator most certainly gave the impression that the farmer had no control whatsoever.

Mr. SMITH. He has not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a situation which I can not admit as existing.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like to be permitted to explain why I can not admit it. Perhaps it would be more logical if I should explain why I do not admit the assertion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am quite sure the Senator from South Carolina has heard of the dairymen's league of the State of New York and neighboring States, entered into voluntarily by thousands of dairy farmers for the purpose of controlling the price and other conditions in relation to the dairy industry; and they have been measurably successful in that. The Senator from South Carolina will not assert that the wheat farmer has no control over the price of wheat. He may not have control as of a given day, but, directly or indirectly, through a whole season he has a control in proportion as he increases or decreases his acreage in wheat.

Mr. COUZENS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the individual farmer have any control over that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In many, many instances individual farmers decrease their acreage in one crop because they see that the price is too low, and increase it in another, where they think the price is profitable. I have seen that happen time and time again. They do not always do it with absolute accuracy; but to say that the farmers of the country have no control whatsoever over the price of their principal products, as has been said here, is against my own experience.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator may have had some unusual experience.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator might have had a better training, perhaps.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. COUZENS. After all, if one farmer decreases his crop because he visualizes that there is going to be an overproduction, and another farmer increases his production, not visualizing the same thing, is not the farmer who reduces his production affected by the action of the farmer who increases his production because he does not guess the same?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not say that all farmers are affected exactly alike by an increase or a decrease of acreage of a certain staple, but these things run by cycles. The acreage to winter wheat for this coming season is considerably below the acreage of last year, and just as surely as the Senator and I are standing on this floor the price of wheat next autumn will be higher than it was last.

If I recollect aright, for example, I read in some report that the acreage in Oklahoma planted to winter wheat this last autumn is 40 per cent lower than it was the year before. It is bound to have an effect. It does have an effect. I am merely attempting to reply to the broad assertions of the Senator from South Carolina. He cited broomcorn, cotton, and two or three other staples or articles which occurred to him as he discussed this question, and he certainly gave the impression that somebody other than the farmer fixed the price in every instance. If that were true, as I said a moment ago, the buyers would not be paying 30 cents a pound for cotton to-day. They would insist upon a lower price if they controlled it. It is because cotton is scarce, due largely to the boll weevil, that the price has gone up. It is not due to any scarcity of fertilizer. There is plenty of fertilizer on hand now.

Mr. COUZENS. I agree with the Senator; but the farmer did not control the price of cotton, did he?

Mr. SMITH. No. The Senator from New York has the price controlled. Even the boll weevil has come in now, according to the Senator's argument, and is controlling the price, rather than the farmer.

Mr. COUZENS. No matter what the conditions were, he did not control the price?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not for this year, but his planting for next season will have a profound effect on the prices of next year.

Mr. COUZENS. If he guesses correctly, of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Everything in business is a guess, more or less.

Mr. COUZENS. Not necessarily so.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Michigan, for information, if he believes that the Government should fix the price of the products of the farm, or the products of manufacture, if it is a legitimate function of the Federal Government to fix prices of commodities, of labor, or of anything else?

Mr. COUZENS. I do say that the individual farmer has less control over the price he is going to get for his product than the manufacturer has, if, indeed, he has any control. In other words, the farmer has one crop in a season. The manufacturer may change his course of production from day to day, in accordance with market conditions, and is not bound by the same conditions by which the farmer is bound.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator desire to ask a question?

Mr. SMITH. No; I will let the Senator finish his statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] asked the Senator from South Carolina if he is a State socialist. I feel pretty certain that the Senator from South Carolina is no such thing.

Mr. SMITH. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But I do invite attention to this amendment, and in that respect, in part at least, the question asked by the Senator from Maryland has a bearing. There is no scarcity of fertilizer whatsoever. That is conceded. The price is lower, in proportion, than upon any other article purchased by farmers necessary to the conduct of their business.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, there is a scarcity of calcium arsenate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A decreasing scarcity. It was scarce last year. It is much less scarce now.

Mr. HARRIS. It has gone up 300 per cent within two years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; owing to the immense demand incident to the discovery that that chemical is useful in handicapping the boll weevil; but the trade is responding to the demand. The production this year is infinitely greater than it was last year, and the price has been going down as compared to last year's price. There are many things, may I say, in which farmers are interested which are difficult to get, and expensive to get. Why confine Government operation to nitrates? Where I live, and where large numbers of livestock are on the farms, a fence post is getting to be a pretty expensive article to obtain.

I can remember very well when we could get the very best white cedar fence posts for 15 cents apiece. Now they cost nearly 50 cents apiece. They have to be brought from Canada. Why does not somebody rise and offer a resolution to appropriate a million or two or three million dollars to have the Government go to Canada and get fence posts for my neighbors and myself at cost? There are any number of things one could bring up, which may seem ridiculous at first, but the purchase of which I think would be consistent with the effort reflected in this bill. There is far more of an emergency in respect to fence posts than there is in fertilizer, the price of which has not gone up, and of which there is no scarcity.

I have every sympathy with people on the farms who have difficult times. I have seen people have very, very difficult times, and have had some myself, but never yet have I found a paternal government able to lift agricultural industry, or any other industry, out of the difficulties which have come to it as the result of natural economic law. It has never been done in the history of the world. None of us is perfect in the conduct of his business. Most of us make mistakes year after year, and learn by experience.

I think I can appreciate the condition, for example, in which the wheat farmer finds himself to-day. It is due, in my judgment, to two major reasons; one, immense overproduction as the result of the demand for wheat and bread during the war, when the wheat acreage immensely increased, and the farmer, left with his increased acreage on his hands, kept on planting it after the war was over, and there was too much wheat. Then in certain sections of the country the per acre production of wheat over a 10-year period does not average much more than 8 or 10 bushels per acre, and no section of country on the face of this globe can prosper at raising wheat, and nothing but wheat, when only 8 or 10 bushels per acre is produced.

Mr. KING. Or even 14 bushels.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Farmers can not live on it. The soil has been cultivated for 30 years out there, and not one thing put back on it to refertilize it. It is going back toward exhaustion. The farmer has impaired his capital.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I recognize that what the Senator says is correct, and I am in entire accord with him, and do not agree with this amendment; but in view of the fact of this great increase in acreage and the poor yield per acre, a condition has arisen which leaves many farmers on the farms without a source of income or any means of protecting themselves.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a very, very difficult situation.

Mr. COUZENS. Has the Senator any suggestion as to how that might be remedied by any act in Government, private or otherwise?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I remember that was very thoroughly discussed last year in connection with the so-called agricultural credits bill, which bill I supported as did a great majority of Senators. The Government in that legislation provided additional facilities for the extension of credit, under proper safeguards of course, to people especially in farming regions who found themselves greatly in need of extended credits, but could not get them from local banks because the local banks were overextended. I think legislation of that kind is justified, is warranted, and in many instances it would be helpful; but I do not think it will be helpful for the Government itself to go out and purchase supplies for the farms to be delivered to the farmer at cost, or to purchase products from the farm to be sold by the Government somewhere else at a supposed profit.

I do not think we will ever get anywhere with either of those proposals because they are uneconomic. They are in violation of the law of supply and demand, and that law can never be violated with impunity over any considerable length of time. That is the reason why I am opposing the amendment of the Senator from Georgia. It thrusts the Government into the business of buying and distributing fertilizer. There is no emergency. That is admitted. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] says there is not any emergency.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator believe one of the remedies for aiding the farmer is diversification so he is not confined to a one-crop plan?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think diversification in the long run is the answer to the whole thing.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator believe in the Government helping to that conclusion?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If such a thing is possible, I do; but I can not see any help in the pending bill. I am wondering whether it is possible for the Government to really aid them effectively, because diversification can only be achieved on the farm after the expiration of a considerable number of years. No farmer who, we will say, has nearly all his farm in wheat or in corn or in any one crop can in one year's time become engaged in diversified farming. Take the bill that is now before us. It authorizes a loan of $1,000 to any farmer of reputable character who is not so heavily in debt as to make it impossible or impracticable for him to carry any more debt. It says, "Here is a thousand dollars which you can have at 6 per cent. You are going to buy cows or chickens or pigs or sheep." The idea seems to be that the thousand-dollar loan is going to make a diversified farmer of him. Why, Mr. President, it will not start him on it; it will not even give him a start.

If he is going into the dairy business, he will have to build a silo; and if he builds a 150-ton silo, it will cost about $1,100. He has to build a cow barn; and if it is to come within the sanitary requirements of the cities to which he sells milk, it has to be a pretty good barn. He can not build a barn that will hold 20 cows for less than $3,000. He has to fence his land to hold the livestock when it is turned out. He has to get various articles of equipment in addition to buying the cows. A thousand dollars will not last him two months in an endeavor to make a diversified farmer of him.

No man can completely change his method of doing business out in the open on a farm in one year's time. It is a slow process, involving gradual changes one after another, working from one kind of business and slowly going into other kinds, until finally the man is raising several different kinds of crops and is selling some milk and some butter and some eggs and some pork. I think the thousand dollars may as well be put in the middle of the street. It will not get him anywhere.

I notice that the loan is to be a lien on the livestock which the Government is to purchase for the farmer and on the natural increase of the livestock. Suppose the farmer bought a flock of hens, and the hens hatched out some little chickens, not one of those little chickens can be sold until it is released from the lien, no matter if they are only half as big as a man's fist.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator assumes that because we propose to help the farmers to enter upon diversified farming they would change their entire business and prepare to do nothing but the dairying business. He speaks of a silo and 20 cows and new barns. The Senator must know that just because it is proposed to have diversified farming is no reason why a man must give up all his other work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not say that.

Mr. DILL. His argument against that was based on that theory.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think not. I may have misstated my argument, but I certainly did not intend to have it based on that theory.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator think that a thousand dollars to a man who has no money with which to buy pigs and cattle would help give him a start, would help him start his process of changing, which the Senator says will take a few years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I honestly believe, and I understand the bill is confined largely to the wheat-growing areas where the acreage is very large, that if the Government wants to stake a farmer in that country in such a way that he may become a diversified farmer or engage in diversified farming within any reasonably short period, it had better loan him $10,000 than $1,000.

Mr. DILL. Of course, the Senator said it would take several years to do this.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; even with the $10,000 loan.

Mr. DILL. Of course, $10,000 would start him on another kind of business than farming. I thought the purpose of the bill was simply to assist him gradually to change from being a purely wheat farmer to doing some other things that would bring more income and would tend to diversify his farming activities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the bill were just a starter for annual bills of this sort at $1,000 per year, perhaps I might agree with the Senator.

Mr. DILL. I speak of this because the Senator knows that in the Eastern States the farmers have a few pigs, a few sheep, a few cows, and they raise some wheat and some oats, and in no case scarcely through the Middle West do they have a dairy farm and dairy barns.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am speaking of the bigger ones.

Mr. DILL. But in the far West they raise nothing but wheat, and they are to-day in a condition that they can not even begin the operation of having a little stock and gradually working into diversified farming. I ask the Senator from that viewpoint whether he does not think there is some merit in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the object of the bill is meritorious, but I think the bill will accomplish nothing.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. The Senator from Washington spoke of the farmers of the East, and I assume he includes in that everything east of the Mississippi and quite a little west of the Mississippi that are diversified farms. The process of becoming diversified farmers must come through the slow process of the years. The country in which I live raised nothing but wheat 100 years ago. Through the slow process of the years it now raises or produces 15 or 20 or 30 articles. The farmers have done it, as experience has taught them, a little bit now and a little bit next year and a little bit the year after. But to think that this $1,000 loan will transform anything over any great extent of territory is to confine one's faith to a very slender reed. I promised to yield to the Senator from Wyoming, and I now do so.

Mr. KENDRICK. I want to ask the Senator, who is not only a practical but a successful farmer, if he were to recommend a change from the one-crop system to diversified farming, whether he would not in the natural order of things recommend a gradual change?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; a very gradual one.

Mr. KENDRICK. Such as he has apparently been inclined to ridicule.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I did not ridicule a gradual change. I ridiculed any attempt at an abrupt change and say that it is impossible.

Mr. KENDRICK. On the other hand, the Senator pointed out that the amount of $1,000 would be entirely ineffective in making the gradual change.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think so.

Mr. KENDRICK. I believe the Senator will agree with me that a thousand dollars on the average size farm will fairly well stock that farm with both cattle and hogs, will he not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. What does the Senator mean by an average size farm—160 acres?

Mr. KENDRICK. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not. A thousand dollars will come nowhere near it. The farmer would not only have to stock his farm but would have to house the stock.

Mr. KENDRICK. It appears from the Senator's talk that we can not avoid the conclusion that he is viewing the question from the standpoint of the extensive farmer, rather than for the one of limited means, for whom benefits of this act are primarily intended. The information that comes to us is in effect that in many of the farm units there was diversified farming before the Government offered encouragement to go solely and entirely into wheat production.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was a very unfortunate event.

Mr. KENDRICK. If that be true, there would be found already on the majority of the farms in the wheat-growing district outbuildings to meet the needs of the situation. Then the Senator must not overlook the fact that has been pointed out here that there should be a very great economic need for livestock on the farms in the producing of food and subsistence for the farmer and his family. That in itself would prove highly economical, because while they could live easily without the livestock, they can not live comfortably without it. My opinion right along has been that instead of making this amount $1,000 it should be limited to $500, and therefore make the change even more gradual from the one-crop system to diversified farming than will be done under the total of $1,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator and I generally have pretty similar ideas about these problems, as I happen to know from conversation with him on many occasions.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield to the Senator from Maryland when I have answered the Senator from Wyoming. If this were to be an annual extension of credit thoroughly systematized and supervised with a degree of paternalism which the Senator from Wyoming never would permit on his ranch, nor I on mine, it might work out practically, but my contention is that merely the loan of $1,000 is not going to give these great farming regions any distinct advantage. Furthermore, as the Senator himself has suggested, more calamity than anything else would result from a state-wide or semination-wide attempt on the part of farmers to suddenly change the entire character of their business and endeavor to raise crops and produce articles with which they are not familiar.

As the Senator said, it is infinitely healthier, though it may be a little more painful in the beginning, but in the long run it is infinitely more healthy in its results if the change from one-crop farming into diversified farming is made gradually over a considerable term of years. The Government may some day think that it is worth while to take up and encourage that kind of transformation, and a transformation achieved after that fashion would be perhaps all right, but the bill pending before us apparently goes upon the assumption that by loaning $1,000 we are going to change the method of farming on thousands and thousands of farms in our great Northwest, and the Senator, I think, knows that it will not happen.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wanted to say to the Senator, and I call attention again to the fact in spite of his joke about the little chickens that it is presumable under the bill, and I believe it will prove practical in experience and results, that the money will be employed in the purchase of cattle, sheep, and swine on the farm. The Senator knows very well that even if the amount here appropriated and limited to $1,000 should be small to begin with, the natural increase from this livestock would stock the farm in a very short time.

He is not overlooking the fact, I am sure, that the fund proposed to be provided here is not presupposed to increase the quantity of livestock in the country so tremendously in one or two years, but it is to be distributed over a period of three years, so that the whole process will be a gradual one. It is no doubt considered that all of this livestock can not very well be purchased and supplied in any one year. So I am sure that the plan of the proposed legislation is very much more sane and rational from the standpoint of the farmer and diversified farming than the Senator is allowing himself to believe.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from New York whether his attention has been particularly called to the extremely precarious nature of the security that is proposed to be given to the Government for the loans which are to be made under this bill. Among the other purposes for which money is to be loaned is that of purchasing chickens for the farmer. Of course, we all know that chickens are of a rather perambulatory nature and are likely to wander off from the premises to be destroyed by hawks or crows and sometimes merely to be hopelessly lost. Then, of course, chickens are likewise exposed to theft. There would always be a likelihood, too, that even if the chickens on which the Government reserved a lien escaped those dangers, they might be eaten by the borrower before it got back its loan on them or perhaps die of the pip. Personally, I could not conceive of any object on which it would be more difficult to obtain anything in the nature of such a substantial lien as this bill contemplates than a chicken.

I would like to ask the Senator from New York another question. Has he stopped to think how far assistance of this kind, if rendered to the farmer, is likely to work demoralization in his industrial character? We all know that our old southern slave conditions had their strong as well as their weak side. They created a pure and delightful society, they produced many noble men and women, and they contributed many great men to the political and military history of this country; but, of course, the fatal infirmity, economically speaking, of the old southern society was that slavery sapped the principle of self-help, which is another way of saying that it aimed a destructive blow at industrial thrift. Under the institution of slavery it was entirely too easy for the master to have some squalid negro man or slatternly negro woman to do something for him that it would have been well for him to do for himself with the consequent disciplinary effect. Happily, the present economic structure of the South is being built up with splendid success on entirely different foundations.

Now, will not the inevitable tendency of such loans as are proposed under this bill be to produce just such economic results as were produced at the South by slavery? Will not the habit of relying on the Government for things for which men should rely upon themselves only become more and more a settled habit, until we shall find very much the same ruin to character worked in this country that was worked in England by the indiscriminate practice of government poor relief?

I ask the Senator from New York whether these two points have occurred to him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall first touch very briefly on the second question which has been asked by the Senator from Maryland. There is no doubt about what paternalism in government leads to. Everyone knows that it leads a people to a state of dependency. Of course, emergencies do arise and overtake industrious human beings from time to time which only the Government can meet. I think there are occasions when the Government is justified in taking paternal action, but, generally speaking, it is a dangerous experiment. It is very popular sometimes at the outset, but the imposition of a paternal government operated by a large bureaucracy inevitably becomes very burdensome on the people. I have thought on a good many occasions in recent years that we are slowly transforming the Federal Government at Washington into a huge, top-heavy bureaucracy, manned by thousands and thousands of persons about whom no one knows anything, who are remote and mysterious and irresponsible, who are armed with some little power through which by the stroke of a pen they may regulate the acts of some family living 1,000 miles or 2,000 miles from Washington. I wish we could halt that tendency. I have cried out against it on a good many occasions, but with very little success. I have been accused upon some occasions of being an "old-fashioned Democrat" in that regard. I find myself very lonely even in that category.

The question raised by the Senator from Maryland is well worthy of our consideration, not so much, perhaps, in connection with this especial bill, but in connection with the general tendency of legislation to-day. Now as to his first question——

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject may I interrupt him?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like to answer the question of the Senator from Maryland.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well, I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator stated that he believed perhaps some conditions might arise which would justify paternalism.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Temporary in character.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator means that the paternalistic undertaking must not be unconstitutional?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; I am assuming that we will obey the Constitution.

Mr. KING. And the Senator, of course, with his splendid mind and his fine ability, appreciates the fact that we have a dual form of Government; that the States may do things which are forbidden to the Federal Government; that a thing paternalistic in character might be done by a State and there would be no State inhibition against it, but the same act would not be within the power and the authority of the Federal Government. I am sure the Senator will assent to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Utah is correct.

Mr. KING. Now the Senator, of course, must agree with me, because he is an "old-fashioned Democrat" and believes in our form of Government, that it is not within the power of the Federal Government to lay its heavy hand of taxation upon the Senator from New York because he is thrifty and prosperous and has ability, in order to recoup my losses because of my lack of ability or my lack of thrift or even because of my misfortune. It is more than paternalism, it seems to me—and I ask the Senator if he does not assent to that view?—to invoke the taxing power of the Government to take from those who have in order to put money into the pockets of those who have not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not know that I can answer that observation in a sentence, and I shall not attempt to do so at this time. Of course, I live under the impression that dollars must be earned, and that even though we start out by lending a dollar to the people who need the loan sooner or later that dollar must be earned and repaid. That is the only honest mode of life, and the only sane system of finance in the conduct of a government.

Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Maryland in regard to chickens has to do with this very question of paternalism and bureaucracy. If really the Government is to take a lien not only on livestock which it purchases for the farmer but upon their natural increase, it will inevitably compel the employment of thousands of inspectors to go all over these vast regions to count the calves and the little pigs and the little chickens; otherwise this language is not worth the paper on which it is written as providing any kind of security to the Government.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. Is not the Senator drawing the picture rather large? Is it not a fact that that provision being in the act itself might be taken as an indication of the belief that the farmer who borrows the money is honest and that the Government is relying upon his honesty in recognizing that there is a lien on the property? In other words, I do not think we need to draw an act that presupposes that we can not rely upon the integrity of the farmers of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I only know that the Government does not trust people so implicitly in other walks of life. It does not trust the taxpayer.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; the Government does not trust the income-tax payer. It examines his return with the greatest of care to determine if he has been guilty of any omission, and it sends agents to his home or office to examine his books.

Mr. COUZENS. Is that true in the case of every one of the taxpayers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is true in the case of everyone where there is the slightest evidence or suspicion that something has been left out.

Mr. COUZENS. They will do that in the case of the farmer where there is prima facie evidence that the farmer has not lived up to the intent of his borrowing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; that is true, but it will take a great many thousand employees to do it. Mind you, this is going to apply to millions of people. This act is intended to apply not only to the wheat area, as I understand, but to the rest of the country. Another $25,000,000 was put in the bill in the committee just for good measure, to cover all the parts of the country not covered by the first $50,000,000. I think I am right in that.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true; but the man takes the risk of going to jail for violating the act, and I do not believe that any man is going to take all the chances that he would take if there was no lien upon his property.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true in the case of every statute practically—the citizen takes the chance of going to jail—but I notice that the Government always employs a sufficient number of inspectors to see that the statutes are enforced; in other words, it does not leave it, in the first instance, to the people who are to live under the law, but it proceeds to find out whether the law is being obeyed. I have in mind certain existing laws which seem to be violated somewhat wholesale, and the Government still goes on trying to stop it. But, Mr. President, I honestly believe that the overhead charge necessary to carry out a measure of this sort in the way provided by this bill will be so heavy that it will tend to defeat the very purposes of the measure; in addition to which I think a loan of a thousand dollars, as provided in this act, will not accomplish what the sponsors of the bill hope to accomplish by the legislation.

I had not expected to discuss the body of the bill itself, but to confine myself to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Georgia, which, to my mind, if adopted as an amendment to the bill, will make it so much the worse.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I did not expect to take the time of the Senate on this bill until I saw what course it was taking and listened to some of the objections that were being made. Then I had hastily prepared a chart which is hanging on the wall here, and which I am going to use in the argument I shall make.

I am the chairman of the committee that reported this bill. I started in on the hearings, which extended over a considerable length of time, opposed to the bill. I did not believe that we ought to enact the kind of legislation that is provided in this bill. I feel, therefore, that having started in opposed to the bill, and having come out of the hearings in favor of the bill, perhaps the same feeling applies to most other Senators.

This is one occasion when I wish every Senator could be here and hear what I have to say, not because of any ability that I possess, not because of any wisdom of mine, not because of any superior judgment of my own, but because I am probably the only Senator in the Chamber who has heard all the testimony that has been offered in favor of this bill; and I can not conceive how other Senators can reach a different conclusion than I reached or fail to be influenced in the same way that I was influenced. Therefore I am deeply interested and exceedingly anxious that Senators should look not upon the proposition now before us in an attitude of ridicule or derision.

Let me say in addition to what I have said that if this bill is enacted into law not one dollar of the money will go into the State that I have the honor in part to represent in this Chamber, so that I can not be moved by any selfish interest. In fact, those of us coming from other agricultural localities than the one that will be somewhat benefited by the enactment of this legislation have been subject to censure from our own constituents, because there is a depression in agriculture everywhere. My State and your State and every State where there is any agriculture to speak of are in a very depressed condition, and all agriculturists and farmers are asking for various kinds of legislation and measures that in their judgment will bring about relief.

This bill is not intended to affect the general agricultural situation of the country. If it is enacted into law, it will apply only to Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Minnesota. There may be some other sections and some other localities that will be affected by it; but after listening for many days to the evidence in this matter I reached the conclusion that there were no other localities in the country where there were farmers who could qualify under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am advised that an amendment was offered calling for an additional $25,000,000, the language of that amendment being so broad and comprehensive as to be interpreted, as I understand, to apply to any part of the United States where the agriculturist may suffer.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is right. I was speaking of the bill without the amendments of the committee, and without any of the pending amendments. I am opposed to every one of these amendments. I am opposed to the committee amendments, not because those in favor of those amendments are not moved by the very highest of motives, but because when we start in on a proposition of this kind if we subject it to amendment from every agricultural locality where they are in a depressed financial condition we shall have, before we get through, an omnibus bill that will overwhelm us and the country, too.

We decided in the Agricultural Committee that the wheat farmers in these particular localities—not all of them in those localities, but the wheat farmers in the particular localities that I have mentioned—had made a case, showing that there was something very materially different in their localities and that that difference had come about through the action of the Government itself during the war. That is what won me over to the farmers up in that locality.

Now let me call the attention of Senators to this chart. The chart represents North Dakota. The same argument will apply to Montana, to the north half of South Dakota, and to the west half of Minnesota.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. Before the Senator directs the attention of the Senate to his chart, I should like to call his attention to a statement which he made in his opening remarks to the effect that this appropriation of $50,000,000 would not apply to more than two or three or four States in the Union. My understanding is that the purpose of the bill is to encourage a diversity of farm products.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. And the industry that I have heard mentioned most prominently is the dairy industry. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that thousands of dairy farms in New England have been abandoned within the last 10 years because dairying there has proved to be unprofitable; and I am wondering if there is any provision in the bill whereby the New England farmers who have experimented with dairying until they have found it unprofitable can be encouraged to diversify their products?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not any such provision in the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Does not the Senator think that farmers in the East who have experimented with dairying, and have found out that there is great overproduction——

Mr. NORRIS. They have not found that out, Mr. President. There is where the Senator is making a statement that will not be borne out by the statistics. That has not been found out. There is not an overproduction in this country.

Mr. McLEAN. I think I am familiar with the figures. There has been some importation of dairy products within the last year, I think amounting to 500,000,000 pounds, or something of that sort; but I think the Senator will find, when he inquires into the character of those importations, that it still follows that milk and butter can not be produced in many sections of New England at a profit at the present time.

Mr. NORRIS. No; and I can tell the Senator a place in Washington where they can not be produced at a profit. I presume if you paid $30,000 for a few feet at one corner of the Capitol here you could not produce milk and butter there at a price that would enable you to make a return on the investment; but, laying it down as a general proposition, there is no overproduction. There has been, rather, an underconsumption in the world of dairy products, and we can not do any better work than to increase it if we can.

We had before us, on this very proposition that the Senator has mentioned, the dairy farmer. He is hard up, too. He has not been making much more than a living, but he has been making a living.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer the first question that the Senator took 15 minutes to ask. Let me have five minutes to answer it, and then he can ask another one. We had that dairy farmer before us, and without exception every one of those dairy farmers said: "We are not afraid of overproduction in the dairy business. Get your fellows up in the Northwest into the dairy business and into the hog business. It will not hurt us. There is room for all of us."

Mr. McLEAN. That is necessarily so, because your market would be far west of ours.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, if in 10 or 15 years from now the dairy business, for instance, is very much increased in North Dakota, part of their market will be Europe. There is not any doubt about that, and there will be a very great market over there when the people of Europe get on their feet and commence to eat.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator's reply to my statement that a good many dairy farmers in the East have gone out of business I think was hardly a proper one. He stated that if a man paid $30,000 for a little piece of land the chances are that his dairy would fail. I want to call his attention to the fact that the farmers who have gone out of business in the East have been the small farmers, and it is only the larger producers who have been able to continue in business.

Mr. NORRIS. There are places in the East where there ought to be no dairying. There are such places in the West; and there is not any doubt that the man who starts a dairy farm where conditions are such that cattle can not be raised or kept under reasonable conditions and circumstances will make a failure at it, or, at best, will not get rich at it.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, does the Senator think that North Dakota is more favorably situated than New England?

Mr. NORRIS. Some parts of it. There are some places in New England that are not as favorable as some parts of North Dakota.

Mr. McLEAN. Take the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut, for instance. Does the Senator think that the chemical composition of the soil in North Dakota and the uncertain rainfall there give it an advantage over Connecticut and Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. Not as a whole, no; I would not say that. But the Senator would not claim, either, that the amount of money invested by the farmer in his farm around Boston or Springfield, or anywhere between them, would compare with the amount that is invested in the farms in North Dakota.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator means that there is a smaller investment in New England than in North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can take it that way if he wants to.

Mr. McLEAN. That is the fact.

Mr. NORRIS. There are also a good many of the dairy farms in Connecticut and in Massachusetts and in Vermont that are owned and operated by men who are millionaires, living in their offices in town, or who are Members of the Senate, and they do not give their individual attention to the work. They hire all of it done. They employ men for everything that is done. If the man in North Dakota worked on that basis and had to hire everything that was done and did not do any work himself, and no member of his family did any work, he would be in the poorhouse in 24 hours. He could not live at all.

Mr. McLEAN. But those are not the farms that are being abandoned. The few wealthy men who own farms manage to stand the loss. It is the small farmers who are going out of business.

Mr. NORRIS. The wealthy fellow, in one way or another, has gotten the farm away from the poor fellow.

Mr. McLEAN. Because he can afford to stand the loss if necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and, of course, the poor man can not compete with him, because he can not stand the loss.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to proceed if I can, but, of course, I will yield.

Mr. McLEAN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not have to yield, because nobody asks me to yield; they just go ahead.

Mr. McLEAN. This proposal is, Mr. President, to give to the Secretary of Agriculture $50,000,000——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to stop the Senator right there. In the midst of my explanation, when I am about to explain this chart, he starts out to make an argument as to what this bill is. I was only half through trying to tell what it is; I had hardly commenced to state what the bill is, and the Senator takes me off my feet now in order that he may tell what the bill is. When I get through he will have all night and all of to-morrow and next week to tell what the bill is. I do not want somebody else to put into my mouth what my idea of this bill is; and, with due respect to my friend from Connecticut, I think I know more about this bill than he does.

Mr. McLEAN. I think that is so.

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the Senator let me proceed and explain this chart?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I am going to apologize to the Senator, and then I am going to ask him to permit me to answer his last proposal, because he has not begun on his chart yet, and he knows it.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but I was just about to begin.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator will have plenty of time.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think Senators ought to take half an hour of time when I am starting on a proposition, when they can just as well do it in their own time.

Mr. McLEAN. I am sorry the Senator is so sensitive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has been trying for some time, in a respectful way, to get permission to interrupt the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With the kindness of the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Connecticut seems to be apprehensive about overproduction of dairy products. I would like to say for his information that last year there were produced at Miles City, Mont., about a million pounds of butter, a very considerable portion of which was sold in the Orient, in China, Japan, and the Philippine Islands; so that is a field in which the opportunities for expansion are indefinite.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield for an interruption of the Senator from Montana by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I would assume, from the statement of the Senator from Montana, that they are producing more butter and milk in Montana than they consume in that State, and that they have a large export.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite right.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator think it advisable, then, to give $50,000,000 to the Secretary of Agriculture to be used by him for the express purpose of repairing the capital of farmers in North Dakota, so that they can compete with Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Senator from Nebraska will be able to answer that question better than I can.

Mr. McLEAN. He will not answer my question; I did not know but that the Senator from Montana would.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rose only because the Senator from Connecticut seemed to be opposing this bill upon the ground that there is already an overproduction of dairy products, and that therefore this legislation is inadvisable.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator admits that there is a large exportation and, of course, the export price will control the domestic price, and consequently the farmers will have to do business at a loss.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What is the difference whether it is sold abroad or at home?

Mr. McLEAN. Because if they sell it abroad they have to get the price that will be given abroad.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and if they did not get a better price abroad they would sell at home. So that we are able to produce butter in Montana and sell it at a low price. The Senator is objecting to this bill on the ground that there is already an overproduction of dairy products.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, there is an underproduction of dairy products and a wonderfully increasing consumption of dairy products. The figures as to the consumption per capita are fully given in the report on the bill. As I remember them the per capita consumption in this country is very low compared with the per capita consumption in other countries of the world, and is capable of being wonderfully increased, and ought to be increased.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I have the report to which the Senator refers. In 1918 the per capita consumption was 37.4 pounds. In 1923 it was 50.5 pounds. So it increased from 37.4 to 50.5 in five years.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. I merely want to ask one question, and then I shall not interrupt the Senator any more. He was about to speak of North Dakota. I thought I would give him an opportunity to reconcile some statements that have been brought to my attention with what he seems to think of the present plight of North Dakota. I quote the Minneapolis Sentinel of December 20, 1923. In that paper it is stated that the per capita savings deposits in North Dakota in 1922 were $150 and in 1923, $159, an increase of $9 per capita. It is also stated, as to the total ordinary savings deposits, that on June 30, 1922, the total savings deposits of North Dakota were $9,481,000, and on June 30, 1923, $11,708,000. It also states that in 1923—and perhaps the Senator from Nebraska will deem this an indication of adversity rather than prosperity—there was an increase in the number of automobiles in North Dakota of 10,000 cars. If there is any truth in these statements, coming from what I assume to be a responsible journal, I would be glad to have the Senator reconcile these statements as he goes along with the view he takes of the present unhappy condition of the farmers of North Dakota.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not necessary to reconcile them. I do not know whether those statements are true or not. As far as I know, they may be true. I hope the savings deposits are increasing. But I do not know just what that has to do with the particular proposition before us. It may be true that a good many people in North Dakota have made money. Perhaps some of them made it as profiteers in the war or subsequent to the war. Perhaps some of them made money out of the very farmer who would be relieved by this kind of legislation; I do not know. I shall not argue the proposition. But, as I look at it, it is no argument against this legislation to say that a lot of fellows in North Dakota have automobiles. I do not doubt but that a good many fellows up there have automobiles who should not have them; and I run an awful chance when I say that, because I am likely to incur the hostility of Mr. Ford. But I do not think that ought to be urged as a reason why this kind of legislation should not be passed.

If we have the truth in the hearings, from professors of colleges, from representative farmers, from farm agents in the various counties, from the State farm officials in the States which will get this money if we pass the legislation; yes, and the local bankers, the large bankers, the business men, the manufacturers, where there are manufacturers, then undoubtedly this legislation should be passed. In the State of Montana there is a State-wide organization composed of bankers, manufacturers, business men, dry-goods men, grocers, with all kinds of business represented, as well as farmers. They know that the prosperity of their State, of the businesses in which they are engaged, depends upon the prosperity of the farmer after all. They realize that these things I am going to describe from this map have been taking place all over the great Northwest, and that it is because of that condition that these farmers are at the doors of Congress asking for this relief.

Now I shall discuss North Dakota; and this chart I have is official. It is drawn correctly according to scale. I have had it enlarged for our benefit. It was known in North Dakota before the war that the farmers of North Dakota had to diversify. The yield of wheat was getting less and less. Farms were growing up to weeds. When your produce one crop like wheat, which is not cultivated, year after year, and produce nothing else, you will get the soil filled with seeds of various kinds of noxious weeds, which will interfere with your wheat crop The wise men of North Dakota knew that they had to quit raising wheat alone, that they had to diversify, and the professors in the colleges, the bankers, the representative farmers in their organizations, all commenced to discuss it, and in 1911 they commenced to practice diversification. They went into it earnestly. They were in fair shape financially then. The farmer could diversify then without asking anybody to help him. So, in 1911, they started out to produce less wheat and more stock.

This perpendicular line at the left of the chart represents the year 1911, when they commenced the diversification program. This line represents the production of wheat in North Dakota. It was up here at this point near the top of the map in 1911. Systematically they started this program of education over the State of North Dakota, with the result that in 1917 it had been reduced down to this point. They had reduced it one-tenth from 1911 to 1917.

Let me pause here to say that you can not do this kind of a job over night. You can not diversify in one year or two years or three years. You can not go into the wheat business, and produce nothing but wheat, and stop all at once and raise hogs. That is a physical impossibility; it can not be done.

The farmers out there had done wonderful work in starting to diversify. Let us see what they had done with corn. When they want to produce hogs they raise corn, if the climate will permit it. Here was corn in 1911, clear down at the bottom of the map. It took an upward stride until 1917, when it reached up to this point in the center of the map, making a rapid advance in the production of hogs. In the hearings we had the number stated. It is all worked out there. That related to corn.

The production of hogs was down at this point on the map in 1911. In furtherance of the program of diversification, they commenced to increase the number of hogs raised, until in 1917, at the beginning of the war period, which I have marked here, it had reached this point in the central part of the map, making wonderful progress in the increased hog production in the State of North Dakota.

This line represents milch cows. They start down here in 1911, and while the number did not increase as rapidly as did the number of other cattle, or of hogs or corn, they did increase quite rapidly and reached this point on the map in 1917.

This line represents other cattle, consisting of all kinds of cattle outside of milch cows, starting at this point and running up rapidly.

So during these years, from 1911 until 1917, we have wheat going down, hogs going up, corn going up, milch cows going up, and other cattle going up. In other words, the plan of diversification was working almost perfectly, and we find that in 1917, when we went into the war, North Dakota was in a fairly good condition as far as diversification was concerned. She had learned her lesson before that time. That was true to a great extent of the other States, but I am using this only as an example. They had learned their lesson. They knew they had to go out of the wheat business to a great extent. They knew that before we went into the war.

What happened in 1917? We went into the war, and Senators know then what happened. Out from Washington into every locality in the United States went the propaganda, paid for by taxation, "Raise more wheat. Raise wheat. Raise wheat." That was the slogan, "Feed the soldiers. You can win the war by raising food. Raise wheat. Produce more bread, more wheat." These fellows answered that slogan. These men answered that proposition.

What did it mean to them? Just think of it for a moment. They had to some extent quit raising wheat. They had erected sheds for cattle and for hogs. They had put their money into cattle and hogs and cows and corn. They had the implements necessary for use on a farm in producing crops in the diversified way I have outlined. They had given up their binders and their other machinery to a large extent, necessary where men are doing nothing but producing wheat. They had been diversifying. They had put themselves in a fairly prosperous condition when we went into the war, and in answer to our cry, in answer to our Government, from a patriotic motive, these men just reversed the whole system.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. Of course they expected a better price for their wheat, did they not?

Mr. NORRIS. They did not get it, if they expected it. We told them that they would get a good price for it, but what we really did was to reduce their price. When we fixed the price of wheat at $2.20 a bushel in Chicago, it was selling for over $3. The North Dakota man's wheat was on the market that very day, selling for $3, I understand.

But, Mr. President, the farmer up there is not complaining about that and I do not want to put that in the argument.

Mr. DIAL. But he did not have to sell if he did not want to.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no. Of course the farmer does not have to plant wheat. He does not have to raise hogs or cows or anything. He can just go out on the prairie and sit down and starve to death if he wants to. He did not have to do anything. He is now surrounded by a condition where there is only one thing he can do. He did not have to answer the patriotic cry of his country, either. He did not have to go into the wheat business, either, but he did. We asked him to do it. We sent men all through the country making speeches everywhere. We devised all kinds of schemes to increase the production of wheat. We said it was a patriotic duty. We would have called him pro-German if he had not done it, and every one of those men in answer to that cry went into the wheat business again when they were trying to get out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has stated that the farmers in the section of the country of which he is speaking realized before the war the necessity for diversification and that they had adopted a plan or policy which had resulted in greatly reducing the quantity of wheat which they produced and in correspondingly increasing the quantity of livestock and other products than wheat, but that as a result of the appeal issued by the Government when we entered the war to farmers to produce all the wheat possible to feed the soldiers, they reversed the policy which they had adopted of diversification and went back to producing wheat in increased quantities again. Can the Senator say, as to the end of the war period and at present, what relation the quantity of wheat grown bore to the quantity grown when the appeal was made to stop diversifying and grow wheat? How far did the reaction proceed?

Mr. NORRIS. I have tried to illustrate it, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas, by the map which I am about to explain. That, I think, will give to the Senate at a glance an idea of just what did happen. I have traced it to the line which represents 1917. That is when the cry "Raise more wheat" went forth. This is the way they answered the cry. Here we find wheat down to this point. [Indicating.]

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator tell us the highest point from which it descended?

Mr. NORRIS. Something over 9,000,000 acres.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In what year?

Mr. NORRIS. In 1911, and going down to a little less than 7,000,000 acres in 1917.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is, the farmer had been gradually going down?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; gradually going down all that time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And going out of the wheat business.

Mr. NORRIS. Then he went up again and in answer to the demand of the Government. The farmers of North Dakota and the other States where they raised only wheat must have known that this demand was absolutely contrary to the policy which, after deliberation and study and advice, they decided to follow. They took a course just opposite to the one they had deliberately decided to follow when they were looking for diversification and increased prosperity.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. On the matter of increase, Doctor Coulter made the statement that in North Dakota alone the increase was nearly 3,000,000 acres.

Mr. NORRIS. During what period of time?

Mr. FESS. During the period of the war.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the period I think I have reached on the map. Here were the farmers down to this point in production [indicating] when the cry went forth. Immediately they started to raising wheat. During the two years from 1917 to 1919 they went back again in wheat production clear up practically to the same point from which they started downward in 1911. What happened to corn while they were answering that cry of patriotic devotion to the country? Here was corn starting right down again. It traveled downward with about the same rapidity that it had traveled upward when they were following out their own inclinations based on business principles. What happened to milch cows? They did not decrease, but they did not increase. They held their own during that period. What happened to hogs? Hogs went down a little more rapidly than corn decreased during that period of intensified wheat production. Other cattle went down, not so rapidly, but still to a very perceptible degree.

What did that mean, Senators, to those men? What did that means to the farmers? Picture yourselves in that condition. From patriotic motives they reversed the entire agricultural program in those States, and now we find them in 1919 with the war over, and what is the condition? They thought when they started in that they would follow the demand of their country, that they would produce more wheat, as was demanded of them, and that when the war was over they could start down again on wheat and up again on the diversification program without any difficulty; but what did they find? First they lost money. Taking one year with another, it cost them more to produce their wheat than they got for it.

The Government itself held the price down. There is no question that if it had not been for the Government machinery wheat would have gone to $4 or $5 a bushel in Minneapolis and all over the country in the same proportion. But we know what happened. We know it was held down. It was kept down and the crop was increasing in regard to its production, and the result was that the farmer lost money.

Now, in 1919 not only had the farmers lost but the business men of North Dakota and to quite an extent the other States that I have mentioned—the western part of Minnesota, parts of South Dakota, and almost all of Montana—were in a very bad financial condition. How were the banks? I say this in no sense as a criticism of the banks, but the farmers could not borrow a dollar to buy another cow or hog or, as jokingly has been remarked here, even to buy an old hen or a young chicken or a dozen eggs. The banks with very few exceptions were absolutely closed to borrowers. It was good business to do it. Their deposits had gone down. Hence the farmers, mortgaged to the teeth when the war was over—and it had been won partially by their efforts and their sacrifices and their losses—found themselves paupers practically, with every bank door closed in their faces, unable to borrow a dollar in order to diversify.

They started again. One thing they could do, as will be seen from the map, was to raise corn. It would not cost much money to diversify for corn. Everybody knows that for a few dollars one can buy enough seed corn to plant, so see how rapidly corn went up. Cattle went up quite rapidly afterwards. Hogs were almost on a level since that time. The milch cows were a little bit better than hogs, but there was not very much of an increase. The increase in the diversified products came from men who will not get a dollar under the provisions of the bill. It is not the men who are able to perform their own diversification that the bill will help.

Does it not appeal to you now, Senators, when you put that picture in your minds, that we owe something to those fellows that we do not owe to the ordinary individuals? Do you not realize that those men, starting out to make their country and their homes prosperous and happy in 1911, embarked upon a diversification program and were carrying it out almost to perfection? Then the war came on. We voted the war. Senators sitting within the sound of my voice voted for the war.

What did it mean to the North Dakota farmer whom we induced to go into the production of wheat, or to the Montana farmer, or any of those others who happened to put in that one crop? We did not think at the close of the war that he was going to be confronted with the condition that did confront him. He did not think so himself, but the facts are that he was thus confronted, and he was at the end of his string and absolutely helpless, made so because he patriotically responded to the call of his country. I do not see how we can get away from it.

Senators laugh at the idea of diversifying by giving a man a thousand dollars to do it. I am sorry the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is not in the Chamber just at this moment, but I will say for his benefit that all the testimony produced before the committee indicated that there would not be any such thing as a thousand dollars loaned to the ordinary farmer. That is the extreme limit. The Senator thinks a thousand dollars will not be a drop in the bucket, but in my judgment when the provisions of the bill are put into effect the average loan will not be more than $600. There will be very few farmers who will get a thousand dollars under the bill. We know that diversification can not be brought about in 24 hours. We know that even if we pass the bill to provide for the $50,000,000, it will not repay those men for many of the losses and sacrifices that they made out there at our call and at the call of their country. We know it is not going to make them whole. It will not be a drop in the bucket for them. There are years ahead of them before they can diversify and put themselves on a prosperous basis up in that country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it expected that this legislation and the loans contemplated by the bill shall be followed by other appropriations and loans through legislation by Congress in subsequent years?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think so; at least there has been nothing of that kind developed in all the hearings.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will state to the Senator frankly why I asked the question. It was prompted by the statement which he had just concluded when I interrupted him, and that is that the sponsors for the legislation realize that it will not prove adequate to carry forward the work of diversification to any very great extent, and that when the remedies afforded by this bill have been applied and exhausted the diversification process will still be very far from complete.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes, I think that is true; but we realize, in the first place, that it takes a great many years to diversify. The Senator from New York said that the first thing we ought to do is to give the farmer $10,000 to buy a herd of cattle; that he would have to put up a barn, and while he did not say so I presume it would follow that he would have to paint it red; that he would have to put up a lot of silos; that he would have to fence a lot of fields. Picture the enormous expense that it would be to carry it out. That would all be true; but the men who start to carry it out will never get that far. Their children may be able to do so, but it is going to take years. We have now a man, say, in North Dakota—and there are thousands of them—living on a farm without a chicken, without a hog, without a cow. Why should we not let such men have money enough to pay for one cow, one hog, and even a dozen chickens?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. They may not be produced by the same causes, but the conditions which the Senator from Nebraska describes in North Dakota and other States in the wheat belt obtain in my section; indeed, in my own State and in other Southern States. The causes may not be the same—as a matter of fact, they are not—but the same conditions exist.

Mr. NORRIS. I think so.

Mr. GEORGE. But may I ask this question: It is contemplated, is it not, that the advances or loans which are proposed to be made by the Government are to be good, ordinary, safe business investments?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think they are, I will say frankly to the Senator. I was coming to that after a while. As a matter of business, we would not be justified in passing this bill. As a banker or as a money loaner, if I were loaning this money out and expected to get it back, I would not consider this security ample.

Mr. GEORGE. That is what I desired to ask the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad the Senator asked my opinion, for I might have forgotten that point, and I do not wish to deceive the Senate. I might as well touch on that subject right now.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator allow me to proceed for just a moment?

Mr. KENDRICK. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. When I was interrupted I was speaking of farmers who did not have cows, who did not have pigs. Some of them have one, some of them have two; and if they have two or three, they will not get any of this money. However, we will say here is a farmer who went into the wheat business, who sold his hogs, who sold his cattle, who sold everything and bought machinery with which to produce wheat. That machinery is now no use to him. In a great many cases the farmer has pastures and some even have silos; but, as a rule, the men who will get this money do not have silos; they have not gotten that far; they have merely been raising wheat in order to help out Uncle Sam. Now, here is a man without a cow, let us say, living on 160 acres of land in North Dakota. Everybody knows that that is not the way to farm; that he ought to have a cow in order to supply milk and butter for his own family; but there are thousands of them who do not have a cow and who are raising nothing but wheat. That man wishes to get a cow. How is he going to get it? Where is he going to get it? He has lost money for three or four years on his wheat, and he has been unable to pay the taxes on his farm. The bank would not lend him enough money with which to buy cattle if he were able to give a thousand-dollar United States bond as security. It is not the question of security that governs the bank, but it is because the bank can not afford to loan a dollar to anybody; in many places the banks have closed. How is such a man going to get a cow? How is he going to get some chickens? And everyone ought to have some. How is he going to get a pig? There is not any place on earth for him to get a dollar with which to buy these things. The avenues for that purpose have all been closed. He did not anticipate such a condition when he responded to the call of his country and went to raising wheat to the exclusion of everything else, but that is his predicament now. We put him there to a great extent; not always it is true; I admit that; of course, what I have said can not apply to everyone, for some farmers in every community would make a failure under any kind of conditions.

Now, responding to the question which the Senator from Georgia asked me about the security, I desire to say that the bill provides that the security shall be a lien upon the stock which is purchased, and that is the only security which is required. Of course, every money lender knows that as a business proposition to take such security would not be good business; but we think it would not be unwise. We think that from the evidence, too, Senators, because there have appeared before us bankers, college men, and farm agents who have stated that they have made a survey from house to house in many counties, have interviewed every man who under any conditions could come under the bill, and they have brought the report that they will help the Government in every way possible, and will do it without a cent of pay. There will be committees in every community who will report to the Government; they will help in making the loans and seeing that the money is not placed in the hands of disreputable and dishonorable men. They are going to try to place the money with the farmers who have honestly gotten into this rut, for the reasons which I have briefly outlined to the Senate here to-day. If they do that, will the Government lose?

Mr. President some of the cattle and some of the hogs will die, and then the owner of the cattle perhaps will not have anything else, and the security will be gone. That will happen once in a while, but we run that risk.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. There will, however, be thousands, in fact, a larger percentage of these cattle, which will not die. The farmers will buy cows, from which they will raise calves and obtain milk and butter for their families in order to consume and to sell it. Eventually, out of the money which they get from the very things which they buy, they will pay the Government back every dollar which they receive. If they are honest, they will do so; and the majority of men are honest. There will be some who are honest, however, who will fail because, as I said, in some instances the livestock will die, and it will be impossible for us to get our money. Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I ask for information, how much money was loaned by the Government, either directly through the Department of Agriculture or through the War Finance Corporation, to the farmers of North and South Dakota?

I desire to ask another question. How much of that money has been repaid to the Government, and what part of it will never be repaid?

My understanding is that the Government loaned a considerable sum for the purchase of seed in order that they might grow more wheat. I am advised at least 30 per cent of the sum loaned has not been paid and never will be paid. It is also true, as I am informed, that many loans made by the War Finance Corporation have not been paid and probably never will be paid.

Does not the Senator think that agriculturists, as well as many of the people of the United States engaged in other industries, are suffering from too much credit rather than from too little? The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] made an able speech some days ago in which he showed that the United States and the States and political subdivisions thereof, including the people, were owing between $120,000,000,000 and $130,000,000,000, a sum so great as to equal, perhaps, one-half of the value of all the property in the United States. Is it not a fact that we have been borrowing and loaning too much; that all classes, including farmers, have borrowed so heavily that the industrial life of the Nation has been affected and the people burdened by debts which are obstacles to prosperity?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator's question is pretty long and I have forgotten the first part of it; but I think he answered the various questions as he went along.

Mr. KING. I hope I did to the satisfaction of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. In the main, the Senator did, I will say.

Mr. LADD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator let me answer the question of the Senator from Utah, unless the Senator from North Dakota has some statistics which were produced before our committee? I yield to him to present those figures, if he has them.

Mr. LADD. I wish to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I have here an official statement by States furnished to me this morning, showing the amount of seed loans, the percentage of the amount that has been recovered, and the amount which has been recovered since it became overdue. I should like to have the figures included in the RECORD, if there is no objection.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask that they be read; I should like to have them read. They will answer the question which I was about to answer from memory. I have seen the figures but, of course, I do not have them before me at the present time. I ask that the Secretary may read the statement presented by the Senator from North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The principal legislative clerk read as follows:

Statement showing the amount of seed loans by States in 1921 and 1922, with the total collections and the percentage collected to November 24, 1923.

(Original amount loaned by States, amount of principal collected to November 24, 1923, and percentage of total collected to November 24, 1923.)

	1921 loan.			1922 loan.
	Loans.	Collections.	Per cent.	Loans.	Collections.	Per cent.

Of the $1,211,973 of 1921 loans collected, $660,403 were paid in by June 15, 1922; $500,576 between June 16, 1922, and June 30, 1923; and $50,994 between June 1, 1923, and November 24, 1923.

In other words, more than $550,000 have been paid on the 1921 loans since June 16, 1922, most of this, of course, having been collected out of crops subsequent to the one on which the loan was made. Of the payments on the 1922 loan, $56,863 have been collected since July 1, 1923, most of which being paid out of proceeds of the 1923 crops.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from North Dakota whether this includes the loans made by the War Finance Corporation?

Mr. LADD. I have not those figures. These figures relate only to the seed loans.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we ought to bear in mind the fact that a loan made by the Government to buy seed wheat in a country where they are subject to drought, or where, for other reasons, the crop is uncertain, is not nearly so good a business proposition as a loan made on cows, for instance. If a loan is made to a farmer who lives in the semiarid country to buy seed wheat, and he purchases seed wheat and puts in a crop of wheat, dry weather or hail or some other thing may destroy the crop entirely, and he may not even get the seed back. In that case it would be difficult to get back the loan. In fact, it seems to me that if the farmer, when we wanted him to produce wheat, was willing to risk all his time and everything in an uncertain venture like that, and we had nothing in it but the seed wheat, he has lost more than we have. Yet, notwithstanding that, these percentages of payment on the seed loans run all the way from 55 to 87 per cent, and undoubtedly a great deal will still come in. There is money coming in all the time on them.

I think that kind of a loan is a much more dangerous proposition than loaning on livestock, because even the failure of a crop does not destroy the livestock. There will always be roughage enough on which they can get through.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wanted to remind the Senator that out in the West it has not been at all unusual for our banks to make loans on livestock that would cover the entire cost of a bunch of livestock, provided the purchaser was well supplied with feed to take care of them. This was done, among other times, when prices were high and uncertain. Surely, therefore, now that prices are down and more stabilized, we can well afford to give the plan our serious consideration; so that it does represent a fairly good form of security, and a fairly reasonable amount of security. But, Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator if he was a member of the Agricultural Committee that reported favorably a bill fixing the price of wheat during the war for the purpose of stimulating the production of wheat?

Mr. NORRIS. I was a member of the Agricultural Committee at the time that was done.

Mr. KENDRICK. The Senator recalls that the price was fixed according to the belief of every member of the committee at that time that the price would be the minimum price?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; Mr. President.

Mr. KENDRICK. And the Senator understands that instead of the minimum price it proved to be the maximum price?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that amendment was put on the bill on the floor of the Senate. I have forgotten now, and I am speaking only from memory, and, as Senators know, it was several years ago; but, as I remember, I made a speech on the floor of the Senate in opposition to it, and I based my opposition on the ground that if we adopted the amendment we would find that in carrying it out the officials would make what we intended to be the minimum price, the fixed and only price, and that wheat would not go above it. I know I felt that way, and I think I expressed those sentiments on the floor of the Senate.

I have no disposition at this late day to say "I told you so;" but, as a matter of fact, the theory of the law was, when we passed it—and there is not any question about it; no one who was here then will deny it for a moment—that we were going to fix a minmum price for wheat in order to encourage the farmer to produce more wheat, and that when wheat got above that price we would let the law of supply and demand take its course. What actually did happen, as we all know, was that we organized this Grain Corporation and absolutely controlled the market for wheat and fixed the price. The price we fixed became the definite, fixed price, and wheat was selling here at the Government-fixed price when over in Italy and other parts of Europe it was selling for from $4 to over $5 a bushel. Wheat was selling for over $3 a bushel, as I remember, on the day when we fixed the minimum price, and all the farmers who had wheat lost the difference between the market price of their wheat and the fixed price that we established by law. In addition to that, the Grain Corporation went out into the world and not only controlled the price of wheat but sold it at a profit; and after paying large salaries and all other necessary paraphernalia connected with the Grain Corporation, all paid out of the wheat farmers' money, they made a net profit of something over $60,000,000, not a dollar of which ever went to a farmer who produced wheat. Mr. President, that profit alone, made by the operation of the wheat act that fixed the price of wheat to the farmer, was more money than is being asked in this bill to assist the wheat farmers to diversify their farming industries.

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. KENDRICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming, who has been on his feet for some time.

Mr. KENDRICK. I just wanted to ask the Senator if he did not consider this one act, and its effect upon the farming community, ample justification for this relief measure?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; certainly it was justification for it.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Federal reserve system, according to the statement of about three months ago, has accumulated a surplus of $218,000,000, and it has put up $63,000,000 worth of buildings. I should like to ask the Senator if a large portion of those profits was not collected, at least indirectly, from the farmers of the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. Every farmer who paid any interest to a bank has made a contribution toward them. All the expense and all the profits of the Federal reserve banking system, of course, comes out of people who pay interest, whether they are farmers or business men.

Mr. BROOKHART. The steel trust is continuing with its great profits, and practically all the big combinations of capital are continuing to collect their great profits from the people of the United States. Is it not true that a large part of those profits are being paid by the farmers of the United States, at a time when they are on the verge of bankruptcy?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, of course that is part of the farmers' expense. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then, since the farmer is paying about 65 per cent more for everything he buys and is selling at about pre-war prices, and since this condition has been brought about by the tariff action of the Government, and the Government's Federal reserve system, and the Government Grain Corporation, and all that, would it not be fair to establish this relief for the farmer, and then to restore the excess-profits' tax to pay the expense if there is loss?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that would be fair if we could do it. I do not know any way in which it can be done, however; and I want to say for the farmer that the farmer is not here asking that he be paid what he lost. It would be fair to pay it if any way could be devised by which it could be done. I do not think there can be any doubt about that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

With reference to the statement made by the Senator concerning the fixing of the price of wheat during the war, my recollection is slightly different from the Senator's. The first suggestion made for the fixing of a price, as I now recall, emanated from the then junior Senator from North Dakota, Mr. Gronna; and the Senator, I am sure, will corroborate my recollection that Mr. Gronna suggested at that time, and others also urged the same policy that a price of $1.25 to $1.45 per bushel, be fixed by the Government in order that the farmer might obtain a higher price for his wheat than he was then obtaining. Strong opposition developed to that suggestion, which came from those who were supposedly representatives of the farmers; and my recollection now is that later the same Senator whose name I mentioned a moment ago asked that the price of wheat be fixed at $2.50, and finally it was fixed at $2.25 per bushel. I am speaking without having the matter brought to my attention since the legislation and may be guilty of inaccuracies. However, my recollection is that that legislation was initiated by representatives of the farmer, and was passed at the instance of farmers. Later, when prices increased, and when our allies overseas were greatly in need of grain, and when it was feared that they were about to collapse economically, the food-control organization as well as other organizations of the Government attempted to fix the price not only of grain but of copper and of other commodities produced in the United States and used by us and by our allies. I was one of those—and I think the Senator from Nebraska was, too—who did not approve of that legislation. I thought that it violated economic laws, and though it might be justified in war time, I felt that it would fail to accomplish the purpose for which it was designed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD and Mr. DIAL addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask Senators not to interrupt me for a moment. I want to say just a word about the statement of the Senator from Utah.

I think what the Senator from Utah has said does not in effect contradict what I have myself said before. I have not claimed that this act or that act was justified or unjustified. I have only been giving what I believed to be the facts. Congress enacted with the very best of motives the law fixing the price of wheat. There is not any question about that. They did it to a great extent upon the demand of at least a portion of the farmers of America, and the argument was that we wanted to guarantee a certain price to the farmer who would plant wheat in order that if he produced it and the end of the war came before he could put it on the market he should not lose everything that he had invested in it. So we said, by the law: "We will guarantee that you will get a certain price if you will plant wheat. When it is harvested we will see that you are paid that much for it."

No one in Congress, as far as I know, wanted that price to be the maximum price, but we all know that that is the way in which the law was carried out by those who had charge of the administrative features of the law, and the price fixed became the maximum as well as the minimum price. Therefore, that being true, when the law of supply and demand would have put the price of wheat up to $3 the farmer who had the wheat could not get more than the price fixed by law because the price was absolutely controlled by the Grain Corporation, and even at the price at which they handled it they made enormous sums of money, not a dollar of which ever went into the pocket of a producer of a bushel of wheat.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the Senator know that at the time Congress fixed the price of wheat, in the spring of 1917, the price of wheat was $3.20 a bushel?

Mr. NORRIS. That is, at Minneapolis?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. At Minneapolis.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I knew it was somewhere in that neighborhood. I have stated that, in effect.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will give me a minute, I should like also to call to his attention the fact that one of the main arguments for fixing the price of wheat below the market price was in order to be able to supply our allies with food at a price they could afford to pay. It was also said that this was the maximum price. I do not know what Congress said, but I know the Grain Corporation said it was a maximum price.

Mr. NORRIS. It was, as far as the Grain Corporation was concerned. They made it so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I happen to have very intimate knowledge of what took place, because I was raising wheat at the time.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator just be willing to let me finish and then take the floor in his own right?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am satisfied the Senate would be glad to hear the Senator, because I know he has knowledge of that subject, and I would like to conclude, if I can.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, there seems to be so much divergence of opinion as to the price of wheat that I would like to know what it was a short time previous to that.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not give that without looking it up.

Mr. GOODING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOODING. I would like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the McNary bill, the bill we call the export bill, if passed, will not relieve the conditions of the wheat growers very generally all over the country?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it will, Mr. President; but I do not want to discuss that bill now. I am discussing the Norbeck bill.

Mr. GOODING. The point I want to make is, if that bill is passed, we will not need this bill at all, because all the wheat growers will be relieved, and not only a few in the Northwest.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator perhaps is not aware that the bill that is pending is the Norbeck bill, the purpose of which is to have the Government loan money to certain classes of farmers to buy cattle and hogs.

Mr. GOODING. I am very familiar with the bill. I listened to the hearings on it for some days before the committee, and I regret that I can not support it. I would support the bill, however, if I found that the McNary bill could not pass. But I am satisfied that if the McNary bill is passed it will relieve the conditions of agriculture and the farmers will be able to buy chickens and cows with their own money. I am sure they would have a credit established to-morrow if the bill were passed to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope Senators will not interrupt me now to make speeches on other bills. I am trying to conclude as quickly as possible. The McNary bill is not now before the Senate. I will discuss it when it gets before the Senate. It has nothing to do with this bill, as I look at it.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield for a question that will take but a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Is it not a fact that when the Government undertakes the guarantee of a minimum price in practice that minimum price becomes the maximum price?

Mr. NORRIS. That happened.

Mr. FESS. Is it not economically true that it will happen?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think that it is necessarily true. It was not in the mind of Congress when they passed the law fixing the price, in my judgment. I never heard a Senator, except myself, make that kind of claim. I was afraid that we had given so much power to the Grain Corporation that they would be able to do that very thing.

Mr. FESS. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FESS. When the matter was being discussed at the other end of the Capitol, that was the contention that was made by certain Members, including myself, that if we fixed a minimum price, giving the authority to the Government to fix the minimum price, the Government would really become a purchaser, and therefore a monopolistic purchaser, and the minimum price in practice would become the maximum price.

Mr. NORRIS. That depends entirely on what this Government corporation would do. As the Senator from Ohio truly said, we devised a corporation and gave it power to buy all the wheat in the United States, and if they paid the minimum price that is all the producer could get for it; but they were not directed to do anything of the kind. I have not the act before me and do not know just how it was worded, but the idea—at least in this Chamber—was that they would hold wheat up to the price fixed in the law and let the law of supply and demand carry it as much higher as might be. Of course, we know it did not operate that way.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think perhaps if the Senator from Ohio will just recur to what actually happened during the war, he will find the reason why, in the general law of economics, the practice which he has just announced did not apply.

Mr. NORRIS. Might I interrupt the Senator? I hope the Senator will not discuss that in my time. It will be very interesting, I know, but at the same time, I do not want to detain the Senate myself in discussing propositions that are not directly affected by this bill. I know we are anxious to get along, and I do not want to go over the field and discuss it all day. I would like to finish.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. GOODING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield the floor. That will end it. I was not through, but I will just stop.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I would just like to answer the Senator from Ohio by making this observation, that the food-control organization had entire charge of the exports of wheat during the war, and inasmuch as this country produced a surplus, the control of the exports controlled absolutely the price, and that food-control organization declined to aid in granting a minimum price for wheat. Therefore the price was arbitrarily fixed by operation of law at the minimum price during the war, if I have been able to understand the proposition.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in regard to some statement made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to the effect that if this bill proposed to loan $10,000 to farmers it might be more effective. If the bill proposed to loan $10,000 to farmers I should be opposed to it. In other words, if the bill proposed to set men up in business I should be very much opposed to any such legislation. But since it proposes simply to help farmers already in the farming business—to tide them over, as it were, to give them some little assistance when they need it, to begin the diversification of farming—it seems to me it is a very desirable piece of legislation.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I would like to make just a few remarks to correct a slight error made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in his figures on this map on the wall. The figures on the left-hand side represent acres, but a cipher has been left off each figure. Where it is given as 900,000 it should be 9,000,000, and so on down the column.

While I am on my feet I wish to say just a word in regard to this livestock loan measure. It is generally conceded that diversification for farmers is a good thing, and I believe the figures will bear out the statement which has been made a great many times by farm papers and experts from the agricultural colleges, that up to a percentage of diversification the raising of livestock and livestock products benefits farmers a great deal. As I remember the figures, if about one-third of the total gross receipts from the farms come from livestock and livestock products, the farmer is, generally speaking, more prosperous than he is if it goes under that amount or over that amount.

The reason is this: That the average farmer who has, say, a half section of land, can milk a few cows, can feed a few hogs, and keep a certain amount of poultry, and perhaps keep a few beef cattle with the same help that he would require in just simply farming his land or in raising grain. In other words, his overhead expense is no more when he has a few cows and a few hogs and a few chickens and a few beef cattle than it would be if he did not have them. In other words, if he works an hour longer before breakfast milking cows and works an hour longer after supper milking cows, he has that much more profit, which goes to help pay his grocery bill.

This measure is not intended to solve the situation the farmers of the Northwest are confronting. It will not do it, and no one who knows anything about the situation ever thought it would or expected it would; but it will help a lot of farmers to get on their feet if some of these other measures, like the McNary bill or the Norris bill, are passed, and farming is put on a paying basis.

There are a lot of farmers in North Dakota and in the other agricultural States who at the present time have very little or no livestock upon their farms and can not under the present conditions buy or borrow money to buy. This measure is intended to give those very farmers a chance to borrow a little money to buy milch cows, not to build farm buildings and silos, as suggested here by one Senator, but to buy a few cows which he can take care of on his own farm with his own help and without any increase in the cost of labor or anything of that kind. That would help him pay his grocery bill and help the farmer make a living for himself and his family.

The only object of this bill, as I see it, is to help in a small way toward starting diversification, which will help the average farmer to pay his expenses on the farm by raising and selling livestock and livestock products.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, rarely have we a bill before us the purpose of which is so clearly set forth in its title as the one we are now considering. This purpose is to promote a permanent system of self-supporting agriculture in regions adversely affected by the stimulation of wheat production during the war and aggravated by many years of small yields and high production costs of wheat. While this legislation is in a sense of an emergency character and is being urged at this time because of the acute distress in the regions particularly affected, yet it is based on a sound principle and is designed to work a permanent and entirely beneficial effect. Its chief purpose is to help the farmer help himself.

Anyone who has given close study to agricultural conditions during and since the war readily understands why the farmer generally, and the farmer of the wheat section in particular, finds his industry in a state of depression. The wheat farmer was the outstanding victim of war-time price fixing. The Government, on the one hand, urged him to grow wheat—always more and more wheat—to help win the war, and then by arbitrary action the Government fixed a selling price for that wheat 50 cents below the market price on the day the price was fixed and easily a dollar a bushel below what the price would have been immediately had the market been unrestricted. Then, following the close of the war, when readjustment was at its height, this Government-fixed price was suddenly removed, just as the greatest wheat crop in recent years was coming into market. Thus was the farmer victimized because of his patriotic response to the plea of his Government to intensify and extend production to help win the war. He was the one producer in the country penalized for his patriotism.

During the same time prices of all other products—clothing, cotton and woolen goods, farm machinery, everything that the farmer required in his farming operations—were soaring. The farmer was compelled to sell his product, wheat, at a price fixed by the Government far below what he would have received in a free market and to buy manufactured goods in a free market at prices grossly stimulated by war conditions. As a result the wheat grower finds himself in a condition of acute distress, and for this condition it can not be said the Government is wholly blameless.

So much for the situation it is hoped to remedy. Now as to the remedy proposed. Its aim is to assist the farmer in getting out of the dilemma into which he was urged and persuaded by his own Government—a dilemma accentuated by a series of wheat crop failures or near-failures. Students of farm conditions agree that one road to the desired goal is diversified farming. The wheat-belt farmer should produce less wheat and more poultry, hogs, and cattle. But with his credit gone, in part because of his patriotic response to his Government's call for excessive wheat production, many of these farmers—indeed, most of those in the Northwest—find themselves without capital with which to make the desired changes in farming operations. Ordinarily, the farmer would go to his local banker or loan agent to obtain the credit necessary, but all the testimony taken by the Senate Committee on Agriculture in the exhaustive hearings on the bill, as well as letters and resolutions from bankers and business men, commercial clubs and similar organizations, indicate that these credit sources are already strained to the limit and are wholly inadequate to meet the present emergency. Hence, the system of direct loans, with a maximum set at the relatively small sum of $1,000, to the individual borrower, and to be made through the agency of the Department of Agriculture, as provided in this bill now before us.

Opponents of this measure are overfond of referring to it as paternalistic and as making a gift to the farmer. It is no gift, Mr. President. It is a loan, and experiments heretofore made in loaning money for the purchase of seed and similar purposes indicate that this money will come back to the Federal Treasury.

But while this talk of gift is being indulged in, it is well again to reflect that the price of wheat arbitrarily fixed during the war took out of the farmer's pockets untold sums of money. The loss the first year after wheat price-fixing to the farmers of my State alone was $50,000,000. The farmer has something coming to him from his Government, but what is offered in this bill is in no sense a gift or bounty—it is a loan which will be repaid to the Government in due time when the activities it is designed to set in motion have had time to bear fruit. It is the hope, and the confident belief of students of the situation, that the system of diversified farming these loans will enable the farmers of the Wheat Belt to engage in, combined with a better system of marketing, which it is designed to encourage through the McNary-Haugen marketing bill, soon to be considered by the Congress, will materially assist the restoration of a condition of permanent prosperity in this great agricultural section.

Mr. President, I desire to add only this to what I have already said. I am opposed to any attempt by the Government to guarantee prices of the products of the farm, even in an emergency like the one confronting the farmers of the Nation at this time. I think it is economically unsound, and I think our experiment during the war demonstrated that the farmer was the victim and not the beneficiary of that experiment. I do not lay all the troubles of the farmer to the encouragement to overproduction of wheat by the Government during the war, to which he responded so patriotically. I do believe, however that much of his trouble is due to that policy and to the deflation policy pursued subsequent to the war, which suddenly and without warning cut off the farmer's normal sources of credit. I think the Government's responsibilities in these respects are sufficient to warrant this departure, which I admit would not be thought of in normal times, and to justify these direct loans to farmers. The farmer has suffered further from the fact that he is the one producer who has not been able to pass his costs along to the ultimate consumer, but must take whatever is offered for his products, resulting in the last few years in prices for farm products far below the cost of production.

The present bill and the legislation proposed looking to an improved marketing system will be two aids toward a restoration of prosperity on the farm which, in my judgment, should receive the enthusiastic approval of the Congress, and which will, I believe, meet with the approval of the country generally.

Mr. President, I fear our people do not fully realize that the Nation has passed into a new economic era in which the balance between agriculture and other industries must be more carefully safeguarded. We are passing through a period of acute agricultural depression. The bill before us is unusual, it is true, but the emergency demands unusual measures. It requires united and aggressive action by those having a common interest in the welfare of the producer.

Prices received by the farmer for his products are still all out of balance with the price of nearly everything he must buy. When the farmer takes his dollar to town to buy the few things his restricted income permits, he finds it worth but 75 cents in terms of other commodities, according to the statistics of the Department of Agriculture.

Secretary Wallace says that 25 per cent of the farmers in 15 wheat-producing States are either bankrupt or have been saved from actual bankruptcy only through the leniency of their creditors.

The wheat that went into a barrel of flour in 1913 cost virtually the same, at the farm, as the wheat that went into a barrel of flour in 1923. Yet the consumer last year paid $7.50 more for the bread made from the barrel of 1923 flour than he paid for the bread made from the barrel of 1913 flour. The farmer lost money on every bushel of that wheat, but a New York baking company had a profit of 117 per cent on last year's business.

Mr. President, our present purpose must be to find means to restore the whole unbalanced situation to a balance, to make the farmer's dollar worth as much as the dollar of anybody else.

The business of the farmer is basic. If it is healthy, it stimulates all other business, because it pours out a full, strong stream of the lifeblood of commerce. If it is sick, the poison of its illness courses through the veins of commerce.

Relief measures such as that proposed in the pending bill are in reality more necessary for national welfare and the good of all the people than for the farmer and stockman they are designed to benefit, directly, in order that all others may be benefited.

Congress can not end the troubles of the farmer by legislative enactment to be sure. But I do say it is up to this Congress to give its first attention and its best attention to the problems of agriculture. It is up to this Congress to take an economic spirit level and go about the job of reducing some of these economic inequalities. To the extent that it is possible for this Government to accomplish it, we must bring about a fairer relationship between the fruits of the labor of the farmer and the labor of others.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything about the bill before the Senate. I intend to vote for it, not because I believe that it will provide any permanent relief for the condition of agriculture, but because a good many Senators think it will do some good, and because I know there are a few men and women on the farms who also hope that it will bring to them some relief. I am not going to take the time of the Senate in discussing the bill this afternoon, because there are other agricultural bills coming before the Senate later, on which I expect to speak at length.

However, there were some charges made this afternoon on the floor of the Senate that the proposition of the Government in loaning money to farmers was a paternalistic idea, and I believe one Senator made the remark that it would demoralize the character of the farmer. I want to call to the attention of the Senate that it is no innovation on the part of the Government to loan public funds to various private enterprises. It is not establishing a precedent so far as paternalistic enterprises by the Government are concerned. I call attention to the fact that the bill provides for the loaning of $50,000,000 of Government funds to the farmers.

I want also to call attention to the fact that according to the Secretary of the Treasury in his report of August 1, 1923, the sum of $337,629,667 of the public funds had been loaned to the railroads for terms of 15 years at 6 per cent under section 210 of the transportation act, of which $191,741,808.97 was outstanding. According to the Director General of Railroads, James C. Davis, loans of the public funds to railroads outstanding October 1, 1923, at 6 per cent for varying terms up to 1937, amounted to $205,723,000. According to the War Finance Corporation loans of public funds to railroads as of October 10, 1922, amounted to $10,000,000.

Assuming, in view of the fact that such report is more than a year old, that this loan if not others is still outstanding, the approximate sum of the loans outstanding to railroads as of this date is as follows: Loaned through the Interstate Commerce Commission, $191,741,808.97; through the Director General of Railroads, $205,723,000; through the War Finance Corporation, $10,000,000, making a total of $407,464,808.97.

I have heard no Senator make the charge that loaning almost half a billion dollars to the railroads out of Government funds constitutes paternalism. I also wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Federal Government donated to the various western railroad companies 200,000,000 acres of public lands in order to help out railroad enterprises. During the 20 years following 1850 the Congress of the United States alone, not including the State governments, appropriated to the railroad companies a total of nearly 312,000 square miles, or approximately 200,000,000 acres of land. It is true that 54,687 square miles, or 35,000,000 acres of those lands were subsequently forfeited for various reasons, but the amount forfeited is more than equaled by State donations of land; that of Texas alone amounting to 50,625 square miles, or 32,400,000 acres.

From the records of the United States General Land Office it appears that the following proportions of the areas of the several States were granted to the railroads: Minnesota and Washington, one-fourth; Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, North Dakota, and Montana, one-fifth; Nebraska, one-seventh; California, one-eighth; and Louisiana, one-ninth.

It also appears that the Northern Pacific Railroad was credited with an acreage of over 44,000,000; the Southern Pacific system, with an acreage of 24,000,000; the Union Pacific system with an acreage of 20,000,000; the Santa Fe system with an acreage of 17,000,000; the Illinois Central grant amounted to over 2,500,000 acres; and that of the Mobile & Ohio to over 1,000,000 acres; many lines now included in the "granger" system—the Northwestern, the Burlington, the Rock Island, and the St. Paul, each received land grants; so that the aggregate acreage donated to each of these systems is several million acres. The total acreage includes more than 137,000 square miles—more than the total entire area of Turkey. It is greater by 50,000 square miles than the territory not merely of Japan proper, but of the Empire of Japan. The land grants to railroads constitute more than 187,000 square miles more than the area of Norway, and 139,000 square miles more than the area of Sweden. The Kingdom of Spain lacks 116,000 square miles and that of Italy 192,000 square miles of being as large as these land grants. The Republic of France and the German Empire contained about the same land area before the outbreak of the European war.

The free land gifts of the American people to the railroads have been, roughly, in round numbers, 100,000 square miles in excess of the area of either France or Germany before the great World War.

I wish to call to the attention of the Senate also the report from the Secretary of Agriculture that the American agriculturist has been deflated to the amount of $13,000,000,000 since 1920. When we talk of agricultural relief and helping certain people and certain interests, I desire to say that the Federal Government delegated the power that it possessed under the Constitution to control the money supply, to manufacture the money, to put it in circulation, and to determine its value to a private corporation, the Federal reserve banking system, and that system used this power in the year 1920 to bring on the deflation period that has deflated the American farmer of $13,000,000,000; but no one has charged that as being paternalism to the banking system of the United States. However, when we come to give back a crumb to Lazarus, who is the farmer, to loan back to him $50,000,000, then we are charged with fostering paternalism.

I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the condition of the banking institutions in the Northwest, which have been extending credit or loaning money directly to the farmers. Many of those banks are going bankrupt because the farmers went bankrupt first. As a direct result of the bankruptcy of the farmers 16 State banks have failed in Wyoming since 1921; 52 State banks have failed in Minnesota, 60 State banks have failed in Iowa, 60 State banks have failed in South Dakota, 96 State banks have failed in North Dakota, and 119 State banks have failed in Montana. The Comptroller of the Currency gives the following figures on the failure of national banks in western States since January 1, 1924: Montana, 16; North Dakota, 14; South Dakota, 8; Iowa, 1; Minnesota, 3; Kansas, 1; and Nebraska, 2.

I stated in the beginning that I did not consider that this bill, if passed, would afford relief for agriculture. The farmers must have better prices. We are going to ask for the passage of an entirely different proposition as a permanent relief for the farmer. We have been charged with fostering paternalism. Mr. Doheny, the oil man, who ought to be an expert on paternalism, the other day was quoted as saying that Senators from the wheat-growing States had backbones of chocolate éclair. I think there is some truth in that charge, because if we had not had backbones of chocolate éclair we would not have tolerated these conditions which we have tolerated so patiently. However, I think our backbone is improving, and the Dohenys may not like it.

I wish to say, in conclusion, that this bill appears to me to be like giving half of a cookie to a man who has not had anything to eat for eight weeks. It may help a very few, it may do some good; that is the reason I am going to vote for the bill.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Minnesota a question. I wish to ask him the same question that I asked the Senator from Nebraska. Will not the McNary bill relieve the wheat growers very generally all over the country? Will it not reach all agriculture practically, so far as that is concerned?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will say to the Senator that I am not a prophet and I can not tell in what shape the so-called McNary bill will be passed by the Senate. I hope that some real, permanent relief for agriculture will be incorporated in the bill before it shall be finally passed. I can not say what action the Senate will take; I can not say what the contents of the bill finally will be when it comes to a vote in the Senate. I hope that the measure will be made the unfinished business very soon.

Mr. GOODING. If it could be brought before the Senate at the present time and passed—and I believe it will pass—it will very generally relieve the condition of agriculture and relieve the condition not only in the Northwest but everywhere, including the wheat grower in all parts of the country, for it covers all lines of agriculture that is depressed at the present time.

The pending bill, if it shall be passed, will relieve only a few people in the Northwest. It will not reach the general condition which exists; it will not be helpful as a whole. Agriculture is suffering in every State of the Union; there is no question about that. I have felt that if we could exert our efforts toward something that would give general relief to agriculture, where it is depressed, that we would be doing a wise thing.

I do not believe that this bill will help to any great extent, and if it does help to any great extent it can only help by increasing the number of cattle upon the farms in the Northwest, when there is already an overproduction of cattle in this country. I do not know of any industry that is suffering any more than the cattle industry is at the present time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we consumed all our beef in this country last year, and we also imported an immense quantity of dairy products.

Mr. GOODING. Yes; but if we put dairy cows out in the Northwest, in that dry, arid section, they must be what we call "dual purpose" cows, animals which will produce beef and butter. In that case we are going to increase the production of beef, and I know of no industry in this country, not even including wheat growing, which is in such a deplorable condition as is the cattle industry to-day. In my State the beef growers have been simply wiped out of business. They have shipped whole herds to the slaughterhouse. That is also true of Oklahoma; at least such a statement was made by witnesses coming before the committee from Oklahoma. They are going out of the livestock industry generally because they have not been able to get a sufficient price to keep the industry alive.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that there is a bill now before the Senate providing for permanent relief for all the farmers of this country and not the farmers of any particular section, and that the Senator regards the pending bill as merely a temporary measure? Is that what I understand the Senator to say?

Mr. GOODING. There is not any doubt about that. I do not think the pending bill will help to any appreciable extent at all; but if it should help, it would only be by stimulating an industry that is already overdeveloped.

I wish to say to the Senator that I have sat upon the Agricultural Committee now for almost two years and I have listened to the recital of the deplorable conditions before that committee from all the States west of the Mississippi River.

There is no question that the conditions are deplorable, but this bill does not go far enough. If the McNary bill can be passed, it will bring about a changed condition almost overnight, because it will hearten the farmers of the country. They have all gone on record for it, I think, in every State that is growing wheat, so far as that is concerned, all the grain growers favor it; it meets the situation, in my judgment, very thoroughly; at least, that is my opinion after listening to conditions as portrayed before the Committee on Agriculture. I believe the McNary bill will solve the problem.

A year ago I introduced a bill for the stabilization of the price of wheat, and I introduced one at this session of Congress, but I am not going to urge that measure, because I know that the McNary bill will go further than my bill will in bringing about an increase in prices for agricultural products.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GOODING. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement. If I had heard all of it, perhaps, I would not have needed to ask the question I am about to ask. Is the Senator opposed to the passage of the pending bill?

Mr. GOODING. I am opposed to passing the pending bill, yes, because I do not think if passed it will relieve the condition of agriculture at all. I make the statement again that if it should relieve the condition of agriculture it could only relieve it by putting what are called "dual-purpose" cows in the arid and semiarid sections, where wheat is grown, and increase the beef production, which is already overdeveloped to a very dangerous extent.

Mr. WILLIS. Was not this bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which the Senator is a member?

Mr. GOODING. It was; but I did not vote to report it favorably.

Mr. WILLIS. Let me ask the Senator another question. He is very kind to yield to me. So far as I am familiar with its provisions, I, too, am in favor of the McNary bill; but how is the enactment of the pending bill going to interfere in any respect with the favorable consideration of the McNary bill, so-called?

Mr. GOODING. The point I make is that agriculture will be perfectly satisfied with one measure, which will relieve the whole condition, and that the McNary bill will increase the price of wheat and will give the wheat grower a credit almost overnight. There is not any question of doubt about that. I think it will meet the whole situation; and why should we pass a measure of this kind if the emergency can be reached in some other and better and more proper way without impairing another great industry?

Mr. WILLIS. While the Senator is yielding, I should like to have his opinion specifically of the amendment that has been offered, I think, by the Senator from New Mexico, touching the banking situation. What does the Senator think of that amendment?

Mr. GOODING. I realize that there is a very dangerous condition existing among the banks of this country. My figures show that 164 national banks have failed since June 30, 1921, and 1,319 State banks. Then there are several States that have not reported their failures since the 1st of July, 1923. It is likely that in the last seven months over 500 State banks have failed in the country, in the different States of the Union. I would vote for the relief of the banks, because that is a different proposition. If something can be done to relieve the condition of the banks, I might vote for that amendment; but I know that the McNary bill will cure the situation. It will do all that this bill proposes to do, and a great deal more.

Mr. WILLIS. I regret to separate from my friend, though we generally agree about questions relating to the farm. As I see it, the amendment relating to banks ought not to be adopted; but I feel strongly inclined to support the bill if that amendment is not adopted.

Mr. GOODING. That is the Senator's privilege, of course. I think if he would study the banking conditions over the West, and if he were as familiar with them as I am, and lived in a State where there have been a great many bank failures, he might feel differently about that; but something must be done if we are going to save not only agriculture but the industries of the country. The country can not go on with the unbalanced conditions that exist; and I know that agriculture is in such a serious condition that I would vote for this measure, hoping that it might do a little good, if I did not believe that the McNary bill was going to pass; but I believe that when the McNary bill is properly presented to the Senate, as it will be, it will be passed almost unanimously. I think when the Senate thoroughly understands the conditions that exist in agriculture in this country there will not be any division on the McNary bill, even if it does provide for a high tariff on wheat. I think the Democrats will come right across the line and help support it. I do not think there is any doubt about that, because I think they are just as keen and just as anxious to help agriculture as the Senators are on this side of the aisle.

Mr. WILLIS. I fear that is a vain hope.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to inquire of the Senator if there are any provisions of the McNary bill that provide for financing this particular proposition?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I think it carries an appropriation of $100,000,000. I do not care to discuss the McNary bill, however, because it is not up for consideration, and I want the Senator from Oregon, who introduced the bill, to discuss it first.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but is it not true that the purposes of this particular bill are different from any of the provisions of the McNary bill?

Mr. GOODING. Oh, yes; entirely different. This bill makes a flat appropriation with which the Government goes out and buys cattle and other livestock, chickens, hogs, and those things and puts them on the farm. I would go that far if I did not think the farmer could do that for himself through the McNary bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. The McNary bill would give every farmer a better market, we will say, for what he has to sell; but this is to provide farmers with something to start upon, something they do not have.

Mr. GOODING. The McNary bill will do this: There may be some parts of the country in which the farmer is suffering from a lack of credit, but that is not generally true. I know of no State, unless it is North Dakota, where the farmers can not go and borrow money at any time to buy a dairy cow, because the bankers realize, first of all, that the farmers with dairy cows are generally the ones that are succeeding; but the point I am making, as far as that is concerned, is that the Northwest, that part of the country in which the farmers have suffered so much, is a semiarid country where the rainfall is light, and I might say uncertain, and is not a dairy country, and can not be made a dairy country, and there they must have what is called the dual-purpose cow, which only means increasing the cattle industry, an industry that is suffering even more than the wheat industry.

Mr. BROOKHART. I agree with the Senator largely upon that proposition; but they do not have even the dual-purpose cows in a great deal of that country.

Mr. GOODING. That is true; but I can not understand a farmer being so poor that he can not at least have chickens on the farm. I can not understand that kind of farming, and I have been a farmer all my life.

Mr. BROOKHART. They are getting mighty poor when they pay about 65 per cent more for what they buy and receive the same old price for what they sell.

Mr. GOODING. I agree thoroughly with the Senator that the farmer is in a most deplorable condition, and I know that this Government is responsible for it. No one else is responsible. And I am going to make a fight for a measure that will give him relief, and that will be permanent relief, or relief for some time, at least.

I want to say to the Senator that in my judgment what the farmer needs is increased prices, not increased debts, which he will have if this bill passes.

Mr. BROOKHART. There is no question about that proposition; but would this in any way interfere with or retard the McNary bill?

Mr. GOODING. No; I do not think it would, but I say again that if we can get the McNary bill we will give him relief all the way through, and permit him to do these things for himself. I think the last thing the Government should do is to go into the business of loaning money in a measure of this kind. I voted for all these relief measures as far as furnishing seed was concerned, and I shall be glad to do that again when an emergency comes along; but I am not in favor of the Government going into business and developing an industry that is already overdeveloped.

Mr. BROOKHART. Has not the Government developed a loaning industry in the Federal land banks?

Mr. GOODING. Yes; the Government has done that. That is entirely different, however.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is another system, is it not?

Mr. GOODING. That is entirely different. In that case the Government takes some security. In this case the Government does not take any security—only the livestock it purchases. The Senator would not loan money on such security as that. I am saying to the Senator that I would vote for this measure if we could not pass the McNary bill; but, believing that the McNary bill, as I have said so often, will cure all the troubles of agriculture—a great many of them, at least—I am for the McNary bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words about this Norbeck bill, as it is called.

I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. He does not think that the dairy farmers are any better off than the wheat-growing farmers. Of course they are.

Mr. GOODING. Oh, no, Mr. President; of course they are better off. The Senator misunderstood me. I said the men in the cattle business—that is, the beef end of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The Senator said that the farmers in every State are pretty hard up.

Mr. GOODING. Yes; I said that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Yes; but let us take, for instance, the State of Wisconsin. They have been in the dairy business for many years back, and they are not so hard up that they are coming down here to ask for any special relief, are they? And the farmers in the southern and the central part of the State of Minnesota are not here asking for relief either in that respect.

I am not so struck on this bill. It is just a crumb thrown out for us if we get it through. I realize that. When I went out and made campaign speeches to the people in my State, I promised them that I was not going down here to vote for more credit for them, because they have too much credit now. I said that I was going down here to see if we could in a way stabilize the prices of farm products. For instance, the bill of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING] was a step in the right direction; but I understand that the Senator from Idaho, because he ran up against great odds, began to get cold feet on his own bill, and probably that is why the McNary bill got in in its place.

Let us analyze this bill. I live in a dairy section of the State of Minnesota. This bill perhaps will hurt me, but I am absolutely willing to lose a little bit if it will benefit the extreme northwestern part of my State, where they have raised grain for years and years, and they are down and out and the banks are broke.

On top of that, Mr. President, we were told to go in and raise potatoes alongside of the wheat. In 1922 we had 20,000,000 bushels of potatoes in the ground that were not dug in the Red River Valley alone, on the Minnesota side. In that same spring I made a speech over in St. Paul, and I was backed up by documents from two different departments, showing that 7,000,000 bushels of potatoes were in the storehouses in the Twin Cities and on the farms and in the small towns in that section, and they were sold in 1923 from the 1922 crop for from 10 to 18 cents a bushel.

Those farmers need a little bit of help. Of course, they are not the same farmers that farmed last year and probably will farm this year. Some of them are gone, some of them are broke, and still, if they are there, some of them, they are not going to put their noses in the vise the second time, I want to tell you that. They are going to try to buy one or two cows, and it might be a good thing for them to get a little exercise, as the Senator from North Dakota said, to get up a little bit earlier in the morning and work a little bit later at night. They want us to slave anyway, and we may as well milk cows when we can not do anything else.

Now, here is the situation: A farmer gets $500 or $200 or $300, let us say, and buys cows. That money will be returned every two weeks—or every day, if that kind of an agreement is made—and that will bring in a little bit of money to the farmer. So far as the wheat production is concerned, they are going to put in wheat; there is no question at all about that; and the McNary bill perhaps will help the grain-producing farmer in that respect. There is no question at all about that.

I would not vote for this bill to-day or to-morrow if the banks of the Northwest, especially in the northwestern part of my State and in North Dakota, part of South Dakota, Montana, and a few other States in the West, were in a position to loan money; but they can not loan money at all, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] so ably stated a little while ago. Therefore, suppose in my section of Minnesota I can sell a few cows. There is no question about that; and probably the Senator will think that I will vote for the bill because I can sell off a few cows from my herd. I am willing to sell a few of them for the people up there, and it is not going to be a county agent that will scrutinize them before they are sold, either, I want to tell you.

So there you are. We are willing to help all the members of this great American family. That is what we are here for, and the Government is to blame for the deplorable condition that American agriculture is in to-day. It is up to us to quit talking about the Republican Party and the Democratic Party. So far as I am concerned, each of them is just about equally bad.

I intend to support the McNary bill. I am not going to jump from this bill to the McNary bill. I think if we amend the McNary bill it probably will be a pretty good measure to put through, but as a matter of emergency we ought to help the farmers in the States that need help now.

So far as I am concerned, I should be willing to vote for the bill of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING]. His bill was unanimously indorsed at the convention we had up there, not because the bankers and farmers and business men of the Northwest believed in any subsidy to help the farmer, though you have given it to the railways, as the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] has stated; but in a case of emergency, for a couple of years' time, the Senator's bill should have gone through, and not any other bill, and I want him to remember that. We looked over the Senator's bill, and I am really sorry that he got cold feet and did not push it a little further. It probably would have gone through if he had.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator from Minnesota that my feet never grow cold—not on occasions of this kind, and when I think I am fighting in the interest of agriculture. I am for the McNary bill because I know that it is a better bill than mine, and I do not think I would be true to agriculture or to myself if I did not take the best bill that I could get and help pass it. That is the reason why I am against the Norbeck bill, and that is the reason why I am against my own bill and shall not ask for its consideration unless I find that the McNary bill can not pass. Then I may ask for some consideration of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. GOODING. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Somebody seems to be a little afraid that we are going to overdo butter production. That is the same thing we thought when we began to have more poultry on the farms of the State of Minnesota. Why, lately we have organized egg-selling associations and poultry associations, and I know I had the honor to assist in appropriating more of the money of the taxpayers of the State of Minnesota for fairs and associations, and so forth, to encourage the poultry industry.

We made money. One of my neighbors in Minnesota is getting more from the sale of eggs laid by his hens than he gets from his fine dairy herd of Guernsey cows.

Mr. GOODING. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Just one more thing. The Senator has not cold feet yet, has he?

Mr. GOODING. No; I have not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Does the Senator realize full well that the farmer can also go into the hog business? The farmers can raise more swine on the farms, if you will help them, and perhaps if you will extend some aid to them to buy stock, they will not need to buy any fertilizers, which Senators have been discussing here to-day.

MERCHANT MARINE—TRADE WITH RUSSIA.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, the whole country is interested in our merchant marine. In 1920 Congress passed a very comprehensive act in an effort to encourage our shipping. I noticed the other day with great pleasure a ruling which the Shipping Board had made, wherein it notified the Interstate Commerce Commission that we had sufficient ships now ready to transport all of our produce, except grain, to all the countries of the world. I ask that this clipping from the Washington Star be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. President, I also notice that we are opening up considerable trade with Russia, and I was delighted to see that our ships carried 75 per cent of the cotton of the South to other countries of the world. They are now carrying considerable cotton to Russia, and I hope it will be transported in American ships. I have here another clipping from the Washington Star relating to this subject which I would like to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clippings referred to are as follows:

SEEKS PREFERENCE ON EXPORT RATES—SHIPPING BOARD ASKS FOR NEW RAIL SCHEDULES ON GOODS CONSIGNED TO AMERICAN VESSELS—SUFFICIENT TONNAGE EXISTS—PROVISION IN THE MARINE ACT OF 1920 WOULD BE APPLIED TO ALL PRODUCTS EXCEPT GRAIN.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star.]

WASHINGTON, February 27.—The Shipping Board took action to-day designed to obtain for American shipping the preferential treatment in handling American exports which was provided in the merchant marine act of 1920.

By resolution it certified to the Interstate Commerce Commission that sufficient American ships are now available to handle all export commodities except grain, and that in consequence American railroads should be required to make through export rates in conjunction with American vessel lines, and to refuse to make such rates with foreign vessel lines.

The effect of the order is to bring into operation section 28 of the marine act, which gives the Interstate Commerce Commission power to enforce the making of such through rates on the railroads, and likewise power to prevent the granting of the same rates to foreign vessel lines. The section has never previously been put into effect, however, because the Shipping Board until now has deemed it unwise to certify that American vessels existed in sufficient numbers and conditions to justify the step.

The Commerce Commission's action in the matter will not be taken immediately, but it is expected that inquiry will be instituted without delay as to the through-rate schedules in existence.

Normally, it is understood, the through export rate schedules made by ships and railroads in combination are lower than the tariffs imposed when exporters pay a domestic rail rate to the seaboard and an additional separate ship rate from the American port to the destination abroad for which the commodities are consigned.

The commission was informed by the Shipping Board resolution that operation of section 28 should not be further suspended "so far as relates to all commodities except grain transported between ports of the United States and Great Britain and northern Ireland and the Irish Free State; the ports of continental Europe north of and including Bordeaux and the east coast of Asia; the islands of the Pacific Ocean, Australia, and the East India Island; and the ports of Central and South America."

Commissioner Thompson, of the Shipping Board, who proposed the resolution of certification, declared in a statement that the effect of the certification, when action had been taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission, "would be to grant shippers benefit of the through export rate only when foreign commerce moved in American flag vessels in the zones prescribed in the resolution, commerce moving in vessels other than American registry taking the domestic rail rate to seaboard outlet and the ocean rate from such seaboard destination."

The lower rates, said the commissioner, would establish a distinct advantage for the shippers to use American flag ships, "in that, with certain exceptions, the through export rate is less than the domestic rate to seaboard destination with the ocean rate added."

"It should greatly increase," he said, "the movement of American commerce in American flag ships and prompt wider utilization of American flag vessels for foreign exports."

Section 28, Commissioner Thompson declared, was "a wise provision of the merchant marine act, and now that there is an adequacy in tonnage in operation under the American flag, the time is opportune to utilize this provision of the American Congress. It is but a statutory aid that previously was utilized by foreign shipping lines under contractual agreements with American railroads."

DESPITE NONRECOGNITION, RUSSIA IS BUYING HEAVILY HERE ON A CREDIT BASIS—BRITISH ACTION A STIMULANT—GREATER PART OF GOODS CARRIED IN SHIPPING BOARD VESSELS—SOME RESHIPPED FROM ENGLAND.

[From the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star.]

Regardless of the fact that the United States has not recognized Soviet Russia, a long list of American manufacturing concerns are engaged in supplying that country's post-revolutionary needs on a credit basis with the backing of American banks. And, for the most part, the goods sold to Russia are being carried to her in United States Shipping Board vessels.

The big increase in Russo-American trade which was looked for with the signing of an agreement between the Russian Foreign Trade Monopoly Bureau and the Allied American Corporation in Moscow on July 14 of last year is materializing to a degree beyond expectations.

It was learned yesterday that the stipulated turnover of not less than $2,400,000, fixed in that agreement with the Russian Government as the aggregate amount of business to be carried on through the Allied American Corporation each year probably will exceed $10,000,000 by July 14 of this year when the first or "trial year" expires. As a matter of fact the $2,400,000 was reached and passed by January 14, six months after the signing of the agreement.

Among the products which Russia is buying in increasing amounts from American manufacturers are cotton, of which the aggregate American shipments through the arrangement already have exceeded in value $1,000,000; motor trucks, agricultural machinery, farm implements and accessories, tools, tractors, belting, milling machinery, typewriters, automobiles, and automobile parts. A partial list of the American concerns, most of whom are selling to Russia on credits of from six months to two years or on a basis of both cash and credit, follows:

* * * * * * *

The corporation, American owned and American directed, has, since the concession was obtained from Russia, recently opened branches in London, Paris, and Riga. At these points, as at New York, the corporation acts as agent for the sale of goods to Russia and the purchase of Russian products, such as hides, furs, caviar, butter, and eggs. The concession stipulated that the imports into Russia must not exceed the exports. That the corporation has met this requirement also was borne out in the statement of one of the officers yesterday. The contracts entered into thus far have been without loss, and there has been no defaulting, according to Dr. Armand Hammer, secretary of the corporation.

"With but very few exceptions, and excluding the Ford Motor Co., the goods bought from American concerns have been purchased on credit ranging from six months to two years," Doctor Hammer said.

Because of the greater liberality of the British banks in extending credit to the Russians, even before Britain recognized Soviet Russia, Doctor Hammer said a considerable amount of the business handled by the corporation had been originating in the British markets. He cited cotton as an example. American cotton to the amount of $1,000,000 had been bought in England by the corporation and shipped to Russia, he said.

RADIO IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to digress from the discussion of the Norbeck bill for just a moment to speak on another subject. I am somewhat of a radio fan, and on last Saturday evening there was delivered over the local broadcasting station an address by Mr. Laurens E. Whittemore, who is the secretary of the interdepartment radio advisory committee of the Department of Commerce, in which he gave the facts as to radio development in foreign countries. That address was so full of information regarding the development of the radio and the treatment of radio broadcasting stations and radio receivers that I asked him to send me a copy, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Before sending the address to the desk I want to call attention to one thing in it which seems to me extremely important in connection with the development of radio. In every other great civilized country where radio is developing there has been built up a system of licensing of the man who listens to radio. It is called a license; it is in reality a tax. Mr. Whittemore says that in Germany a citizen can not even buy a radio receiving set; he can only rent it, and a part of the rental is a license fee, used in running the broadcasting station.

The result is that in this country radio is developing more rapidly and is becoming more and more useful to our people than in all other countries combined. We have 40 Class B broadcasting stations, and some 500 others in the United States. In England they have only 9, and they are under the control of one broadcasting company. In Canada they have 35, in Holland they have 6, in France 4, in Germany 3, and in Belgium 3.

I simply call attention to this to show that the system of free radio growing up in America is developing the art in such a way that no man can have any real conception of what may happen. I do not want to be considered a prophet, but I venture to say that it is not beyond the realm of probability that within the next five years the proceedings of the Senate and of the House of Representatives will be broadcast over the country by means of microphones which will be placed upon the desks of Representatives and Senators.

I do not want to take more time, but I ask that these four pages comprising a speech delivered by Mr. Whittemore, who is an authority on the subject, may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as a part of Mr. DILL's remarks, as follows:

[Address broadcast by Mr. Laurens E. Whittemore, secretary interdepartment radio advisory committee of the Department of Commerce, from broadcasting station WRC in Washington, D. C., Saturday night, March 1, 1924.]

RADIO IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

We sometimes get so interested in listening to our favorite broadcasting station or in hearing snatches of other programs that we are not aware of the many ways in which radio is being used both in this country and abroad.

Probably the most important use of radio is for communication with ships. The safety of many human lives may at any time depend on the successful transmission and reception of a single radio message. More than 12,000 of the 33,000 registered ships of the world are supplied with radio apparatus. About 8,000 of these radio-equipped ships fly the American flag. If all of these ships are to communicate with one another and with shore stations in any part of the world, there must be some sort of agreement as to the frequencies or wave lengths which they shall use. The present international agreement on this subject was worked out at a meeting in London in 1912, and does not provide adequately for the needs of present-day shipping. Plans are under way, however, for a meeting of delegates from the countries of North and South America to modernize the international radio agreement or "convention," as it is called.

The 500 kilocycle or 600 meter wave is used by ships throughout the world for calling and for transmitting S O S signals and distress messages. The 666 kilocycle or 450 meter wave and the 1,000 kilocycle or 300 meter wave, which are also authorized by this international agreement for use on ships, are within the range to which most broadcast receiving sets can be tuned, and the calling and distress wave is just above those used by the broadcasting stations. It is no wonder that sometimes our sensitive receiving sets pick up signals which are being transmitted by ship and shore stations. This sort of interference would be much more troublesome but for the fact that the marine radio services have agreed quite generally, out of consideration to the broadcast listeners, to discontinue the transmission of messages on these waves during the evening hours. There are, however, also several other waves of lower frequency or longer wave length which are used by ships for message traffic during these hours as well as at other times.

Other countries as well as our own have established radio fog-signal stations and radio direction-finding stations along the seacoast for the use of ships. Through the use of these special radio services a ship is enabled even during fog to determine its position at sea and to approach a shore or enter a harbor in safety.

An entirely different class of radio service is that of transoceanic or intercontinental communication. This service is a radio equivalent or supplement to the service rendered by the cables. For example, a message may be filed at the office of the Radio Corporation of America in Washington or in New York for transmittal from one of their high-power radio stations in New Jersey or on Long Island direct to a similar station operated by a company in England or Italy or Sweden or Argentina, etc. This service is going on steadily day and night, using very low frequencies or long wave lengths which do not interfere with broadcasting.

The distances over which these low-frequency high-power stations communicate are ordinarily 3,000 to 5,000 miles. In some cases they have been heard halfway around the world, which is as far away from the transmitting station as any receiving station can be. Since radio waves travel at the rate of 186,000 miles per second, it takes only one-fifteenth of a second for the waves to travel this distance, halfway around the world.

The messages normally sent by these high-power stations are radiotelegraph messages in code. Radio telephony from high-power stations is being conducted in an experimental way, and it may be possible some day to talk from our homes direct to a telephone subscriber in Europe.

These high-power transmitting stations have large antennas supported on towers, which in many cases resemble the towers of the United States Naval Radio Station at Arlington. The highest power-transmitting stations of the world are not those at Arlington nor at the Eiffel Tower in Paris, as many people think. There are several stations in the world of about equally high power, each using apparatus employing 500 kilowatts. Among them are the United States naval stations at Annapolis, Md., and Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and the radio stations at Bordeaux, France; St. Assise, France; Leafield, England; and Berlin, Germany. There are also about 50 other stations at various points over the world having power of 100 or 200 kilowatts each and 2,500 lower-power land stations for short-distance commercial communication.

In the principal nations of the world aircraft are beginning to employ radio for communication with each other and with their landing fields. Many of you heard the radio messages between the dirigible Shenandoah and the radio stations on the ground on the night of her recent forced flight. In Europe commercial aircraft travel regularly between London and Paris, and they are in constant communication with the landing fields by radio, telephone, and telegraph. The international list of radio stations includes 52 radio stations on aircraft.

Radio is used in this country for point-to-point communication over land to a greater extent than in other countries. This use is particularly valuable in mountainous regions, where wire lines are hard to maintain.

Little do we who listen to broadcasting night after night realise how fortunate we are to have so great a number and variety of excellent programs within our grasp and to be able to listen to them at will, unhampered by license fees and Government restrictions, which are imposed on receiving sets in many other countries.

As compared with our 40 Class B stations and some 500 other broadcasting stations, the British Isles have 9. It must be kept in mind, of course, that the area of the British Isles is about the same as that of our New England States. The broadcasting in England began in November, 1922, and is all done by a single company, the British Broadcasting Co., whose membership is made up of English manufacturers of radio receiving apparatus.

The British Government requires that the listener secure a permit or license for the operation of his receiving set, the annual fee being about $2.50. A part of this fee goes to the Government, while a part is turned over to the British Broadcasting Co. It is reported that about 600,000 licenses have been issued for the operation of receiving sets in England. A regulation requires that regenerative receiving sets be operated, so as to avoid producing radiation from the receiving antenna.

In Germany the use of radio receiving sets is still further restricted. Receiving sets are rented by the month or year for the reception of certain limited kinds of broadcasting, such as market and financial reports and, to a limited extent, concerts.

The regulations in France have recently been revised and are much more liberal than before. A permit for a receiving set is still required, however, and a small fee is collected.

In Australia the regulations provide that a receiving set shall be sealed up in such a way as to insure that the listener can tune only to the broadcasting station to which he is a subscriber. If he desires to receive programs from a second station, he must pay an additional fee for the privilege of using a set which will also receive programs from that station. One of the Australian broadcasting services is called "Farmers' Service," not, however, because of the listeners, but because that is the name of the concern which operates the station.

Other countries have somewhat similar regulations. As a whole, more freedom is gradually being given to the broadcast listeners.

It is interesting to notice the frequencies or wave lengths used by the broadcasting stations in other countries. I will state the wave lengths in meters, since most of us are more familiar with that designation than with the frequency in kilocycles, though I believe that the adoption of the kilocycle (meaning 1,000 cycles) is a proper forward step. Notice how they compare with the range from 222 to 545 meters covered by American stations.

England's eight stations are between 350 and 500 meters, with an additional relay station on 303 meters. Canada has about 35 broadcasting stations; Holland has 5, France 4, Belgium and Germany each 3. One or two stations each are operating in Spain, Algeria, Denmark, Hungary, Italy, Morocco, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Australia, Argentina, Brazil, and Uruguay. These stations use wave lengths which vary from 200 to 4,000 meters.

While the number of stations in each of the European countries may seem rather small, it must be remembered that distances there are not great. In Holland and Belgium, for example, the listeners who have tube sets, or "valve sets," as the English call them, can hear British and French broadcasting stations as well as their own. International radio broadcasting is, therefore, common in Europe.

Last December, during the special tests which many of you doubtless recall, British broadcasting stations were heard in America, and now almost every night one or more of our American stations are heard in England and France. Broadcasting from "the States" is heard regularly in Alaska, and once in a while a report of reception comes from a far-away point in South America.

For the benefit of listeners in England who have only crystal sets, the British Broadcasting Co. has on several occasions during the past two months staged a demonstration in which an American program has been relayed. On February 5 of this year the entire evening's program from station KDKA, at East Pittsburgh, Pa., was received at one of the British broadcasting stations and was automatically rebroadcast for the benefit of the listeners in England.

The British have the advantage over us when it comes to listening to radio programs across the Atlantic Ocean. Since the radio waves do not travel as far through daylight as through darkness we can not hear the programs from England unless they are transmitted after nightfall here, which puts it about midnight in London. At this time we are, however, subject to interference from our American stations. When it is 8 o'clock in the evening at Washington it is 1 o'clock in the morning in London, and there is darkness over the intervening ocean. So by staying up until after the English stations sign off for the night, the British listener has a chance of getting an American program.

This business of listening to broadcasting in other countries is resulting in the quick spread of musical hits. The "banana song" has been heard on the air many times in England and, in a corrupted form, even in Germany, since its popularity here.

Music, of course, makes its universal appeal no matter what the language spoken by the listener. However, for speeches and addresses, and especially for announcements, radio is adding its stimulus to the demand for an international language of some sort, and it is interesting to learn that from certain stations announcements are sometimes made both in English and in the language of the country where the station is located.

The programs given by the broadcasting stations in other countries are very similar to our own, but more attention is given to the transmission of complete plays, operas, and similar productions. Simultaneous broadcasting of the same program from several stations is common in England.

The radio amateurs of England are organizing a British radio relay league, which is similar to the American Radio Relay League. The transmitting of a radio message from country to country by the low-power sets used by these "transmitting" or "relay" amateurs has already been accomplished to an extent which has called for the proposal that an international radio relay league be organized. American amateurs have been heard in France, England, Hawaii, and Australia.

A story is told of a Scotchman who had a dozen guests at his house one evening and wanted them all to hear the radio concert. Not being the possessor of a loud speaker, he succeeded in borrowing several pairs of phones and at last had one earpiece for each listener. After the concert he was heard to complain that he himself had been unable to get an ear in edgewise. We have all had trouble at times getting a word in edgewise but we now have the entrance of the "edgewise ear."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4121) to extend the provisions of certain laws to the Territory of Hawaii.

The message also announced that the House had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 2014. An act to authorize the Park-Wood Lumber Co. to construct two bridges across the United States Canal which connects Apalachicola River and St. Andrews Bay, Florida; and

S. J. Res. 57. Joint resolution authorizing the erection on public grounds in the District of Columbia of a statue by José Clara personifying "Serenity."

The message further announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 192. An act to provide for a girls' dormitory at the Fort Lapwai Sanatorium, Lapwai, Idaho;

H. R. 472. An act to authorize the deposit of certain funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of Navajo Tribe of Indians and to make same available for expenditure for the benefit of said Indians;

H. R. 498. An act providing for a recreational area within the Crook National Forest, Ariz.;

H. R. 593. An act authorizing the issuance of service medals to officers and enlisted men of the two brigades of Texas Cavalry organized under authority from the War Department under date of December 8, 1917, and authorizing an appropriation therefor; and further authorizing the wearing by such officers and enlisted men on occasions of ceremony of the uniform lawfully prescribed to be worn by them during their service;

H. R. 837. An act to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C.;

H. R. 1018. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Albany Institute and Historical and Art Society of the city of Albany, N. Y., the silver service which was presented to the U. S. cruiser Albany by citizens of Albany, N. Y.;

H. R. 1831. An act to loan to the College of William and Mary in Virginia two of the cannon surrendered by the British at Yorktown on October 19, 1781;

H. R. 1869. An act for the incorporation of the Grand Army of the Republic;

H. R. 2812. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands not longer needed for the Rapid City Indian School;

H. R. 2876. An act to provide for the payment of claims of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota for back annuities;

H. R. 2877. An act providing for the reservation of certain lands in New Mexico for the Indians of the Zia Pueblo;

H. R. 2883. An act to validate certain allotments of land made to Indians on the Lac Courte Oreille Indian Reservation in Wisconsin;

H. R. 3684. An act for the enrollment and allotment of members of the Lac du Flambeau Band of Lake Superior Chippewas, in the State of Wisconsin, and for other purposes;

H. R. 4117. An act authorizing an appropriation for the construction of a road within the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, Ariz., and for other purposes;

H. R. 4161. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to acquire necessary rights of way across private lands, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, needed in constructing a spillway and drainage ditch to lower and maintain the level of Lake Andes, in South Dakota;

H. R. 4803. An act to authorize the sale of lands and plants not longer needed for Indian administrative or allotment purposes;

H. R. 4804. An act to authorize the allotment of certain lands within the Fort Yuma Indian Reservation, Calif., and for other purposes;

H. R. 5549. An act to detach Jim Hogg County from the Corpus Christi division of the southern judicial district of the State of Texas and attach the same to the Laredo division of the southern judicial district of said State;

H. R. 5633. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Board of Supervisors of Hinds County, Miss., to construct a bridge across the Pearl River in the State of Mississippi;

H. R. 5737. An act granting the consent of Congress to the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Kankakee River at or near the State line between section 19, township 31 north, range 15 east of the third principal meridian, in the county of Kankakee, State of Illinois, and section 1, township 31 north, range 10 west of the second principal meridian, in the counties of Lake and Newton, State of Indiana;

H. R. 5799. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Seminole Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6420. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River in section 17, township 28 north, range 23 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the State of Minnesota;

H. R. 6925. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Chicago to construct a bridge across the Calumet River at or near One hundred and thirtieth Street in the city of Chicago, county of Cook, State of Illinois;

H. R. 6943. An act granting the consent of Congress to the village of Port Chester, N. Y., and the town of Greenwich, Conn., or either of them, to construct, maintain, and operate a dam across the Byram River; and

H. R. 7039. An act to amend section 72 of chapter 23, printing act approved January 12, 1895.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 584. An act to authorize the county of Multnomah, Oreg., to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Willamette River in the city of Portland, Oreg., in the vicinity of present site of Sellwood Ferry;

H. R. 3265. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge between the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Queens in the city and State of New York; and

H. R. 3681. An act to authorize the building of a bridge across the Waccamaw River in South Carolina.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Casper, Wyo., protesting against any immediate amendment to the transportation act of 1920, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. WILLIS presented a resolution from Neff Post, No. 77, the American Legion, of Neff, Ohio, favoring the passage of legislation granting adjusted compensation to veterans of the World War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution of the Horton Shop Federation and the Ladies' Auxiliary Shop Federation, of Horton, Kans., protesting against a resolution adopted by the Horton (Kans.) Chamber of Commerce, which opposed the passage of legislation making any substantial change in the transportation act of 1920, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON presented a resolution unanimously adopted by the Mississippi Division, Farm Labor Union of America, at Tupelo, Miss., favoring the passage of the so-called Norris-Sinclair bill, providing aid to agriculture, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens in the State of Mississippi praying for the passage of legislation to reduce the so-called war tax on alcohol used in the manufacture of flavoring extracts, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HARRIS presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Dr. J. R. McCain, of Atlanta, Ga., remonstrating against the inclusion in the revenue bill of a tax on gifts as affecting adversely the interest of colleges, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted at the midwinter meeting of the Georgia Press Association at Cairo, Ga., favoring an appropriation to erect in the city of Washington a monument to commemorate the memory of Henry Woodfin Grady, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INVESTIGATION OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, several days ago the Senate passed a resolution providing for an investigation of the Attorney General. It now appears that adequate provision was not made for necessary clerical assistants. An amendatory or supplemental resolution was prepared and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and that committee is now ready to report. I ask unanimous consent that I may present the report at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. KEYES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably Senate Resolution 183.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 183) submitted by Mr. JONES of Washington on the 3d instant, was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution No. 157, agreed to February 29, 1924, be, and the same hereby is, amended to include authorization for the employment of such clerical and other personal services as may be necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of said resolution.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2122) to create a Pribilof Islands fund and to provide for the disposition of surplus revenue from the Pribilof Islands, Alaska, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 200) thereon.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 2510) for the relief of William Henry Boyce, sr., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 201) thereon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon where indicated:

A bill (S. 314) concerning actions on account of death or personal injury within places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States;

A bill (S. 2691) to amend the Penal Code;

A bill (S. 2693) in reference to writs of error; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 4) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to the adoption of amendments thereto (Rept. No. 202).

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon where indicated:

A bill (S. 78) for the relief of the owners of the barge Anode (Rept. No. 203);

A bill (S. 82) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Comanche (Rept. No. 204);

A bill (S. 84) for the relief of the owners of the steamship Ceylon Maru (Rept. No. 205); and

A bill (S. 788) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Daniel S. Glover (Rept. No. 206).

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. WALSH of Montana the following changes of reference were ordered:

A bill (S. 303) authorizing the conveyance of certain land to the city of Miles City, State of Montana, for park purposes; from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

A bill (S. 2086) for the relief of W. W. Payne; from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 2727) to extend the benefits of the employers' liability act of September 7, 1916, to Otis Dodson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 2728) granting an increase of pension to Clarence J. Cure (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURSUM:

A bill (S. 2729) granting a pension to Jose Rafel Apodaca; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2730) to allow and credit the accounts of First Lieut. W. W. Jenna, Infantry, assistant United States military attaché, acting quartermaster at Athens, Greece, and Belgrade, Yugoslavia, with $11,296.13 disbursed as refundment of expenses incurred, through loss of exchange, in the payment of salaries and bills of officers and employees of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2731) for the relief of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Northampton, Mass.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 2732) granting a pension to Emily A. Duffield; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRUCE:

A bill (S. 2733) to provide for the establishment in the State of Maryland of a fisheries station, to be under the direction of the Bureau of Fisheries of the Department of Commerce; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CARAWAY:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 89) authorizing and permitting the State of Arkansas to construct, maintain, and use permanent buildings, rifle ranges, and utilities at Camp Pike, Ark., as are necessary for the use and benefit of the National Guard of the State of Arkansas; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CREDITS ALLOWED INDIVIDUALS UNDER NORMAL TAX.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6715, the revenue bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on February 29, 1924, the President had approved and signed an act and a joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 2189. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State highway department of North Carolina to construct a bridge across the Peedee River in North Carolina between Anson and Richmond Counties; and

S. J. Res. 83. Joint resolution for the appointment of one member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 7039. An act to amend section 72 of chapter 23, printing act approved January 12, 1895; to the Committee on Printing.

H. R. 498. An act providing for a recreational area within the Crook National Forest, Ariz.; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

H. R. 837. An act to exempt from taxation certain property of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H. R. 1018. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Albany Institute and Historical and Art Society of the city of Albany, N. Y., the silver service which was presented to the U. S. cruiser Albany by citizens of Albany, N. Y.; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

H. R. 593. An act authorizing the issuance of service medals to officers and enlisted men of the two brigades of Texas Cavalry organized under authority from the War Department under date of December 8, 1917, and authorizing an appropriation therefor; and further authorizing the wearing by such officers and enlisted men on occasions of ceremony of the uniform lawfully prescribed to be worn by them during their service; and

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE PRESIDENT WILSON.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short article which appeared in the Laurens (S. C.) Advertiser of a recent date.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Advertiser, Laurens, S. C., February 6, 1924.]

IN THE LINE OF DUTY.

With his characteristic moderation, Senator N. B. DIAL thus refers to the event which has caused to flow the tears of a Nation's grief:

"In the death of Woodrow Wilson the country has lost one of the greatest men, if not the greatest, of modern times. He was a martyr to duty. If his policies had been carried out, recurrence of war would be unlikely and stability would prevail everywhere; the people of all nations would now be following their usual avocations and peace and prosperity would reign. His passing will be mourned by all law-abiding and peace-loving people throughout the world."

He was the friend of the friendless, the champion of the weak, the deliverer of the downtrodden and oppressed.

No soldier at the battle front ever fell more completely or more willingly in the line of duty; and, in his last hours when the shadows lengthened and he knew the end was near, he was absolutely ready.

Other times than these will accord him his rightful place among the world's immortals.

Meanwhile his grateful friends throughout the earth (and the envious enemies in Washington whose loathly hands have struck him down) may well ponder over the following lines which this sad day suggests:

"Speak, History, who are life's victors?
Unroll thy broad annals and say.
Are they those whom the world calls the victors,
Who won the success of a day?
The Persians and Xerxes,
Or the heroes who fell at Thermopylae's tryst?
His judges or Socrates?
Pilate or Christ?"

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 5, 1924, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 4, 1924.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, Thou givest us all good things. We thank Thee for the promise of the days with their glad, cheerful lessons. Graciously awaken in us the joy and the hope of renewal, which oftentimes the unpromising days have caused to die out. May we never allow our labors to become irritating; let cheerfulness abound with industry. Give us the faith that will conquer worry and the steadfast confidence that Thou art not done with the old world yet. O may the soul of the Republic aspire more and more until it shall be said the world over "Blessed is the Nation whose God is the Lord." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 207.

Resolved, That JAMES O'CONNOR of Louisiana be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the standing Committee of the House on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDING THE REVENUE ACT OF 1921.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means on the bill H. R. 6901, to amend the revenue act of 1921.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa presents a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means, which is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

MAINE IN THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend remarks, I insert an address of Hon. IRA G. HERSEY before the Maine Society of New York.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. IRA G. HERSEY, MEMBER OF CONGRESS FROM MAINE, BEFORE THE MAINE SOCIETY OF NEW YORK AT THE ANNUAL DINNER OF THE SOCIETY HELD AT THE HOTEL PLAZA THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 28, 1924.

Mr. President, men and women of the Maine Society of New York. I am greatly pleased and honored to be your guest to-night and to meet and greet those who like myself have been born and reared in the old Pine Tree State of Maine, but who at the present time have a temporary home and "Wayside Inn" in other States, and who all, doubtless, have an ambition when vacation days come to spend a few pleasant weeks each year along the delightful shores of Maine's great Atlantic or on the banks and bosom of her many silver lakes, there to lay our tired heads close up to the breast of Mother Nature and dream the old, sweet dreams again. And then, finally, when life's sunset comes, to make a final visit to the dear old home and find sweet sleep beneath her pines and "sink in the faith of the fathers to rest."

I am to speak to you to-night of Maine in the Congress of the United States, a wonderful part of the history of this Nation. I can not in the brief time allotted me give you the many interesting details of the lives and work of the men from Maine who have made up the State delegations since 1820, when we cut the apron strings that bound us to our kind old mother, Massachusetts.

From 1820 to 1843, a period of 23 years, Maine was represented in both Houses of Congress by average men, who never attained the temple of fame but who did honorable work for the people of their State, such men as Whitman, Shepley, Parris, and others, some of whom were governors of their State before they went to Congress and others left Congress to take a seat upon the supreme bench of Maine.

This period antedated the Civil War, and during that time the debates and work in Congress largely centered around questions of slavery and the general business of the Nation in establishing industries and a system of revenue and finance.

I have only time to call your attention to a few of the great men who served Maine in Congress who made up in a large part the history of their times.

Hannibal Hamlin stands out as the first great statesman from Maine. He had received a fine education, learned the trade of a printer, adopted the profession of law, was in his State legislature three terms, and was speaker of the House of Representatives of Maine. He was at that time a Democrat, as there were only two parties in Maine—Whigs and Democrats—and he remained a Democrat until the formation of the Republican Party in 1860. His was a fine character, a gentleman of the old school, clean in life and thought, a man beloved by all who knew him, a true statesman, and a fearless American.

It is told of him that when engaged in the practice of law a rich neighbor called upon him to draw a deed, which Hamlin did, for which he charged 75 cents. The wealthy client demurred. Finally Hamlin said, "I will call it 25 cents and treat you," which so pleased the neighbor that he paid the 25 cents, and then Hamlin took him over to the corner grocery, which in those old days sold rum, and gave him drinks to the amount of 25 cents, which the client eagerly swallowed, and then, looking up at Hamlin, he said, "Squire, you air the most generiosiest man I ever knew. I am going to give you all my business. I will be damned if I won't."

Hamlin's work in the Congress of the United States was such that when the Republican Party was organized in 1860 he became Vice President with Lincoln, and history shows us that he was a most valuable adviser and assistant to the President during the great Civil War.

He went from the House to the Senate and served in all 14 years in the Congress of the United States. We might spend an interesting evening over the life and work of this great statesman.

He was a great debater. In his fight at home for Congress he was opposed by one Elisha H. Allen, a Whig, and they agreed upon a joint debate over their district. During the close of these series of debates before a great audience Hamlin was to speak first. Allen was a good story teller, which took then with the crowd, and he had many good stories. Hamlin, to the consternation of his opponent, told all of Allen's stories and left him high and dry to follow him in the debate.

Another story is told that Hamlin, when he was Senator at Washington, had a call from a well-to-do business man who wanted some advice and assistance, and when the business had been completed he produced two letters which he had written, and he said to Hamlin, "Write your name upon these letters and they will go under your frank and I won't have to pay any postage." Hamlin fished into his pocket and obtained a couple of stamps and said to him, "Put these on the letters. I can never allow myself to cheat the Government out of even two stamps." This shows the character of the great statesman whose memory we to-day honor.

Israel Washburn, jr., was one of Maine's great men in Congress. He entered the House in 1851 where he remained for 10 years, and in 1861 was chosen Governor of Maine. His work was noted for its practical benefit to the State, his sound defense of the great principles of the Union, and his stern Americanism. He was a splendid speaker and a great orator. He had a brother, Elihu B. Washburn, who went from Maine to Illinois and ably represented that State in Congress during the Civil War. And yet a third brother of this famous family in Maine who rose to honor and distinction, William D. Washburn, served six years in the House and one term in the Senate, coming from the State of Minnesota.

During the period of the Civil War Maine was represented with great ability in Congress by Lot M. Morrill, who was president of the Maine Senate in 1855, governor of Maine in 1857, 1858, and 1859, and was sent to the United States Senate in 1861, serving there until 1876, when he was chosen Secretary of the Treasury.

Another Morrill, Anson P., served in the Maine legislature, was chosen governor of his State and sent to Congress in 1861 serving one term in the House. He was a fine type of statesman and was known in our State and still remembered as the defender of the "Maine law."

During the period of the Civil War our State was powerfully represented in Congress by William Pitt Fessenden, an able lawyer. He also had been a member of the Maine House and Senate. He served one term in Congress in 1841, declined reelection, but came back later in 1853 and served until 1864, when he was appointed by President Lincoln as Secretary of the Treasury, returning to the Senate a second time at the close of Lincoln's term for a period of four years where he served with distinction until his death. He left a great record for fidelity to service and financiering the war. In the most troublesome period of the war he was loyal to the Union, faithful to the flag, strong and mighty in the councils of the Nation, and his work and influence had much to do in making a loyal North supreme in the dark days of the rebellion.

The great test of our Democratic institutions came in the period of 1861 to 1866, and there the sons of Maine in Congress made themselves immortal. I have mentioned Hannibal Hamlin as "The noblest Roman of them all," together with the Fessendens, Washburns, and Morrills. Maine, indeed, in that great struggle to save the Union was mighty in the House and Senate of the United States.

After the Civil War great commercial and industrial questions presented themselves for settlement—how to reconstruct the Nation, how to pay the war debt, redeem the greenbacks, establish the national credit, provide a sound currency, pay reasonable pensions, resurrect destroyed industries, and start the Nation again toward prosperity.

These were, indeed, mighty problems, and in their settlement James G. Blaine, of Maine, was the man of the hour. He was well educated and served a number of terms in the Maine Legislature and was speaker of the Maine House. He served for 20 years in the National House and Senate. He came to the House in 1863 and was chosen its Speaker in 1869; served through three Congresses as Speaker, and was then sent to the Senate, where he remained until 1881, when he resigned to become Secretary of State. In 1884 he was nominated for the Presidency and came within 1,500 votes, in the State of New York, from being elected President. He was again called to the chair of the Secretary of State, and after three years resigned and retired to private life to write his wonderful book, Twenty Years of Congress. His statesmanship was of a high order, and his diplomacy ranks with that of Hay and Root.

Other notable statesmen from our State were prominent factors in the building up of this Nation. I wish to mention William P. Frye. A member of our State legislature, attorney general of his State, he was sent by our people to the House of Representatives, where he served 10 years, and then to the Senate, where his service ended only with his death in 1911. A great service of over 40 years in public life, a record rarely equaled in the annals of public men. He was finely educated in Bowdoin College, a great lawyer, and a presiding officer whose ability kept him for 15 years President pro tempore of the Senate. He had much to do with the shipping interests of the Nation and was always a strong and powerful advocate for all the great industries that have made our Nation famous and prosperous.

Senator Frye came near having presidential greatness thrust upon him not once but twice. In the national convention of 1880 pressure was brought to bear upon him to accept the nomination for Vice President. It was proposed to him before it was to Mr. Arthur. Had he accepted, the tragic death of Garfield would have left him with the highest office in the land upon his shoulders. He refused to allow his name to be used and Mr. Arthur was chosen. Again, in 1900, President McKinley desired him to accept the nomination for Vice President, but Frye refused and said, "Why, what if anything should happen to you?" "Why, then," said McKinley, "you would become President, and no man would be better fitted to fill the place than yourself." Frye said, "I will not take the chance, for I would not be President if it were handed to me on a plate of gold; in fact, I would rather be Senator from Maine than to occupy any other office in the gift of the people." Had Frye accepted, he would have become President in the place of Roosevelt. Maine men and women are always proud of the life and public service of William P. Frye.

In 1881 there came to the House of Representatives from Maine Eugene Hale, a fine lawyer and an able advocate. He served in the Maine House in 1879 during the memorable period of the "count out" in Maine, where the National Greenback Party, so called, formed a fusion with the Democrats to beat the Republicans. After the Maine election of 1879 it was admitted that the Republicans had won the legislature by a large majority, but when the governor and council examined the returns and made their report it was shown that the fusion legislature had won by a large majority. Then came a crisis in the history of Maine.

In the January following the election two legislatures met at the Capitol at Augusta, both claiming to be the real legislature of Maine, one Republican and the other fusion. The Supreme Court of Maine held that the Republican legislature was the legal one. The other disbanded. As soon as the Republican legislature was organized a special committee was appointed by both houses to investigate, examine, and report on the election and the returns made to the governor and council of that legislature. Eugene Hale was made chairman of that committee. His work was wonderful. His cross-examination of witnesses and his investigation of the facts as chairman in these sensational hearings showed him to be a man of no ordinary caliber and placed him at once in the front rank as a great lawyer and a statesman. He exposed the frauds in that election in such a manner as to make him a successful candidate for the National House, to which he was elected in 1881. He served 10 years in the House and then was sent to the Senate, where he served in House and Senate for the period of 30 years. In 1911 ill health prevented further service and he was obliged to retire. His record stands high in the councils of the Nation and the affections of the people of his State as one of the greatest statesmen of his time. He was the leader in the Senate during his last 10 years in that body. No man had a greater control of the Congress of the United States than Eugene Hale, a wonderful leader of men, and a man of few words, but of great political wisdom.

It is told in the cloakrooms of the Capitol that some years ago a new Member from the great West came to Congress with a message from his people to secure a certain piece of legislation valuable to his people. As he did not know the proccdure very well, he approached an old Member as to what he should do. He said to him, "Put in your bill, have it referred to the Ways and Means Committee, and be sure to see Nelson Dingley, jr., of Maine, who is chairman of that committee. If he favors your bill, you can get it out of the committee all right, because he has more power and influence than anybody else on that committee. If the bill is reported to the House, then you want to see Speaker Reed, from Maine, who will recognize you to call it up. With these two men for you in the House you will have no trouble in getting your bill through." The new Member then said, "What shall I do when it goes to the Senate?" "Well, you want to see Eugene Hale, of Maine, who is the leader of the Senate. If he favors your bill, it will be favorably reported, and if it is reported you want to see the President of the Senate, William P. Frye, of Maine, so that he will recognize the Senator who calls up your bill. With these two men for your bill in the Senate you will have no trouble in getting the legislation through." The new Member in astonishment said, "It seems to me that Maine is the whole Congress. I do not know why I should be sent here at all." And this was the actual situation for many years. Maine was the great influence that enacted some of our most valuable laws and needed reforms in Congress.

A well-known leader in Congress has recently said that long service in the Congress by Maine men has made the comparatively small State of Maine a power in the national councils.

While Hale and Frye were outstanding figures in the forefront of the Senate of the United States, Thomas B. Reed and Nelson Dingley, jr., were leaders in the House of Representatives.

Thomas B. Reed was a lawyer of Portland. He served in the Maine House and Senate and was Speaker of the Maine House. He was later attorney general of Maine and was sent to Congress in 1877, serving there, in all, 22 years. He was Speaker of the National House in the fifty-first, fifty-fourth, and fifty-fifth Congresses. He made himself immortal by causing the adoption of what are known as the Reed Rules. He revised the ancient rules of the House that did not meet the times. He presided over the House during the most stormy period of its existence and won out. Many interesting stories are told of him in the House. He was a great debater, of wonderful wit and humor. Before he was Speaker he had made some remarks one day that angered his political opponents, and a new Member on the Democratic side made a speech in which he attempted to ridicule Reed and used personalities of a low and vulgar sort. Reed listened in silence until the fellow exhausted himself and sat down, thinking no doubt that he had annihilated Reed. Reed arose and answered him. Such wit, such humor, such eloquence, the Member abusing Reed seemed to grow smaller and smaller until he was completely obliterated. When Reed had about closed, amid great cheers and applause from both sides of the House, he turned to this Member and, looking him in the eye, said, "And now, Mr. Speaker, having embalmed this fly in the amber of my eloquence, I will proceed to discuss the question before the House."

During the period of the revision of the rules, when the party spirit ran high, a zealous and enthusiastic Member exclaimed, "Mr. Speaker, as for me, I would rather be right than be President." Reed turned to the Member and in his most sarcastic tone said, "Well, the gentleman will never be either."

Reed was the first to count a quorum. It had been a habit of the opposition in the House to sit silent when the roll was called and not answer to their names, thereby believing that they would deprive the House of a quorum and of course deny the House the opportunity to work. Reed added to the roll call the names of those who refused to answer, thereby making a quorum. When an angered Member of the opposition rushed down to the Speaker's desk and said, "I deny your right, Mr. Speaker, to count me present and I desire to read from parliamentary law on that subject." Reed said, "The Chair is making a statement of fact that the gentleman from Kentucky is present. Does he deny it?" And this settled that question.

Reed, after his 22 years of service, feeling that he ought not longer to remain in Congress with his meager salary, but must take care of those dependent upon him, resigned and went to New York, where in a large law firm he made quite a fortune which he left to those dependent upon him. He is remembered by those who knew him in Congress as one of the most able men, and the work of "Reed of Maine" is to-day in Congress recognized as a part of the history of the United States.

Reed was ably seconded and assisted in his great work by Nelson Dingley, jr., a good lawyer, a great editor, trained as speaker of the Maine House of Representatives and as Governor of Maine. He served in the National Congress 18 years. It was said of him by a Member of Congress with whom he served that Dingley knew something of everything, and more of some things than any other person in history.

His mind was filled with accurate and trustworthy information upon all variety of subjects that came up in Congress. He was a walking encyclopedia of industrial, financial, and political facts. He was the author of the Dingley tariff bill and made for himself a great name in the successful enactment of that wonderful piece of legislation, a bill that has been memorable as a model for all subsequent legislation upon the subject.

It was not only in the matter of tariffs that he became immortal but he took part successfully in the able discussions of the merchant marine, the civil service, appropriations, all questions on the currency and national credit, all matters growing out of the public faith, of revenue and protection. He wore himself out in his great work for his State and Nation, and after his model tariff bill had been passed he found himself unable to continue his work in Congress and died on the battle field, as it were. Dingley, the statesman, is written high in the hall of fame in our State and Nation.

With Frye, Blaine, Dingley, and Hale came Charles A. Boutelle, a man who served 14 years in the House of Representatives. He was well educated, the able editor of a daily newspaper which was conducted under his supervision all of the time he was in Congress. In a study of the questions of reconstruction growing out of the war and in combating the spirit of the rebellion that lingered in the South he was a leader and not a follower, a fighter every minute, respected by his friends and feared by his foes. He added much to the glorious history of the State of Maine.

Edwin C. Burleigh was Governor of Maine, 1890–1892, and was elected to Congress in 1897, and served in the House and Senate 18 years. He was a great, big-hearted, friendly man whom everybody loved, who had no enemies in the world, a man who made no speeches, but whose diplomacy was of the highest order. Legislation that he wished enacted was very sure to be successful by his persistency and friendly efforts. In other words, he could get what he wanted for Maine, and he got it. So much did the people of his State love, honor, and respect him that when the senatorial primary law was passed he entered the lists against two of the ablest lawyers in our State, one of them a judge who left the supreme bench and contested with him for the Senate. He won easily over them both and served in the Senate until he died in 1916.

Thomas B. Reed, when Speaker, had as his able assistant and parliamentary clerk Asher C. Hinds, who was sent to Congress in 1911 and who remained there until ill health compelled him to retire in 1915. He left behind him his monumental work, which is the guide to-day of all Members in parliamentary proceedings—the large eight-volume work called "Hinds' Precedents," collected in a masterly order the decisions of all the Speakers down to his time and all the parliamentary rulings and usages, and it is to-day the last word in parliamentary law. It will remain a monument to Congressman Hinds long after other illustrious men have been forgotten.

I have mentioned thus to you some of the great men in Congress from Maine. It is well known that these men I have mentioned were Republicans. We have had a few great Democrats represent us in Congress. In 1911 after the split came in the Republican ranks the Democrats sent from our State Hon. Daniel J. McGillicuddy to the House, an able lawyer who was at once placed in charge of the Underwood tariff bill, so called, in the House, showing that the Democratic Party appreciated the valuable help of a man from Maine.

In the Senate Hon. Charles F. Johnson, Democrat, was sent to represent us, and he was at once placed on important committees by his party and had charge of the Underwood tariff bill when it came to the Senate. He was an able lawyer and soon became a very popular Member of the Senate. I mention these things to show you that Maine has made a place for herself in the Congress of the United States. It is expected that no man from Maine will come to either House or Senate except those well qualified for the duties of the office. It is true that back in 1880 and 1881 we had in Congress two Democrats from Maine, which was in the days of the Greenback Party. They were able to be elected by the combination of the Greenbackers and Democrats, but they were one termers and did not add anything to the history of Maine or the Nation.

I can not speak to you about the men who now represent you in the Congress of the United States. We are living too near to them to give them justice. They are learning the ways that all other men in Congress have to learn before they can make history. There will be Hamlins, and Blaines, and Fryes, and Dingleys, and Reeds from Maine in all future Congresses; but at present the lesson that Maine has learned is this: To keep in the Congress of the United States men that will grow up in the service, for it is only those who remain for 20, 30, and 40 years that make names for themselves in the annals of the country. The first 10 years is learning how to do the work for the people in that great parliament of the world, and you may rest assured that even the present delegation in Congress will bear in mind always those who have gone before, that they will stand loyally by the President of the United States. They will be loyal and true in the settlement of all great questions of the day and the hour, and you may rely that in the future Maine in the Congress of the United States, as in the past, will continue to shine as one of the brightest jewels in the diadem of this Republic.

INVESTIGATION OF SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution, House Resolution 186, from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 186.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of the House a select committee of seven Members, for the Sixty-eighth Congress, and which said committee is hereby authorized and directed to inquire into the operations, policies, and affairs of the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either; said inquiry shall include an investigation of contracts, leases, sales, settlements, accounts, expenditures, receipts, assets, liabilities, properties, and any and all transactions, affairs, policies, and plans of the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and any other corporations, firms, individuals, or agencies in any way associated with or controlled or regulated by the said Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation from the date of the passage of the several acts creating the same, together with an inquiry into such other pertinent matters as may aid the committee in determining and recommending future policies with respect to the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation and the properties and agencies under their control.

Resolved further, That said committee is also hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, and the said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess of the House, and to hold its sessions in such places as the committee may determine; to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to take testimony.

Resolved further, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to issue subpœnas to witnesses upon the request of the committee or any subcommittee thereof at any time, including any recess of the Congress; and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpœnas and other processes put into his hands by said committee or any subcommittee thereof.

Resolved further, That said select committee shall have the right at any time to report to the House in one or more reports the results of its inquiries with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution fully explains itself. It is a simple resolution of inquiry by a special select committee, to be appointed by the Speaker. As far as I know, there is no opposition to the resolution on the part of the Members of the House or on the part of the Shipping Board. Of course, we all appreciate the fact that the Shipping Board is in a little different position from other important branches of the Government. As I understand it, it is not responsible to any Cabinet officer but is primarily responsible to the President or the Members of Congress, and it is intended and thought that perhaps this investigation may result in some good in the way of decreased expenditures by that board. It is more an investigation of the policies and what they intend to do in the future in the way of spending this vast amount of money that is appropriated for them each year. It is with the hope that this investigation may be of some real benefit to the board and to the people that it is offered at this time. I do not know whether there is anything to be said on the other side or not. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire any time on the resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think not.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will this committee have jurisdiction to determine the controversy between the American Bar Association and the Shipping Board?

Mr. SNELL. I can not answer that question; but it will have power to investigate all of the acts of the Shipping Board under this resolution.

I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is necessary to take up the time of the House, and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the United States Shipping Board was created on September 7, 1916. The board began to function in January, 1917.

The board has in the seven years of its existence had seven chairmen, or an average of one new chairman a year: William Denman, E. N. Hurley, John Barton Payne, Admiral W. S. Benson, A. D. Lasker, E. P. Farley, and T. V. O'Connor.

In that seven years of checkered existence the Shipping Board has had 24 commissioners to serve on the board, either as recess or confirmed appointees: William Denman, California; Bernard N. Baker, Maryland; John A. Donald, New York; John B. White, Missouri; Theodore Brent, Louisiana; E. N. Hurley, Illinois; Raymond B. Stevens, New Hampshire; Bainbridge Colby, New York; Charles R. Page, California; Henry M. Robinson, California; John Barton Payne, Illinois; T. A. Scott, New York; W. S. Benson, Washington, D. C.; Frederick I. Thompson, Alabama; J. N. Teal, ———; Chester A. Rowell, California; Guy D. Goff, West Virginia; Charles Sutter, ———; A. D. Lasker, Illinois; T. V. O'Connor, New York; George E. Chamberlain, Oregon; E. C. Plummer, Maine; Meyer. Lissner, California; Albert Haney, Oregon.

In that seven years the Shipping Board has had five separate and distinct changes in the policy of operating the fleet of ships: Operation by the Emergency Fleet Corporation as a whole; managing and operating contracts Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4; to say nothing of modifications of those operating policies and new proposed changes.

The Emergency Fleet Corporation was the agency through which the Shipping Board requisitioned, built, bought, and operated ships, as well as purchased and sold materials, ships, shipyard plants, and securities involving $3,000,000,000 and an expenditure now amounting to nearly $5,000,000,000.

The changes in that corporation are astounding and dismaying. In the less than seven years of its existence and operation, operating under a board of seven directors or trustees, it has had seven presidents: E. N. Hurley, C. M. Schwab, W. S. Benson, A. D. Lasker, J. W. Powell, J. B. Smull, and Leigh C. Palmer.

This corporation, handling, selling, spending money and property belonging to the people amounting to about $5,000,000,000, has had in that seven years more than 12 vice presidents: J. A. Donald, Charles Piez, Bainbridge Colby, Howard Coonley, J. L. Ackerson, T. V. O'Connor, J. B. Smull, A. J. Frey, W. J. Love, Elmer Schlesinger, H. S. Kimball, E. P. Farley, and others.

This poor, much-shifted corporation in its seven troublesome years has had eight general managers: Charles Piez, Howard Coonley, J. L. Ackerson, R. L. Hague, R. D. Gatewood, J. W. Powell, J. B. Smull, L. C. Palmer.

The procession of assistant general managers has been similar to that of the general managers.

Six or seven treasurers have passed along, each one making different changes in the arrangement of personnel and procedure, as each other official from president down to general managers and assistant general managers have done, so the turnover of personnel has been a procession, with the new ones coming in and the old ones going out, just as the old ones had gotten through making terribly expensive errors and had begun to know their jobs.

But when we come to the board of trustees we are amazed. In its short seven years of existence the corporation has had 33 men to serve on its board of directors: E. N. Hurley, J. A. Donald, Raymond B. Stevens, Bainbridge Colby, Charles E. Page, Charles Piez, Admiral W. L. Capps, E. F. Carry, Charles Day, J. H. Rosseter, Admiral W. S. Benson, John Barton Payne, Martin J. Gillen, Albert D. Lasker, T. V. O'Connor, George E. Chamberlain, Edward C. Plummer, Frederick I. Thompson, Meyer Lissner, J. W. Powell, A. J. Frey, W. J. Love, Elmer Schlesinger, H. S. Kimball, E. P. Farley, Sydney Henry, J. W. McIntosh, Ralph V. Sollitt, W. B. Keene, J. E. Sheedy, J. T. Clear, J. Harry Philbin, Leigh C. Palmer.

Along with the five or more changes of operating policy involving changes in Europe and the United States, to say nothing of South and Central Americas, the Orient, of thousands of officials and employees, this poor Fleet Corporation has had 13 operating directors: P. A. S. Franklin, H. H. Raymond, Sir Connop Guthrie, E. F. Carry, J. H. Rosseter, J. T. Cushing, Capt. Paul Foley, W. J. Love, J. B. Smull, A. J. Frey, W. B. Keene, L. C. Palmer.

Boards settling claims have had a procession of members comparable to the unending line of corporation trustees. Literally dozens of men as members of the board, to say nothing of a veritable army of changing attorneys, clerks, examiners, and statisticians have for short periods wrestled with the claims aggregating hundreds of millions—a couple of billions, in fact—and have passed on. But the claimants and their attorneys stayed on the job, thus having all the advantage of the Government in knowing what went on before—and many of the attorneys were formerly with the board and went over to the contractors to pile up claims against the Government.

While all this was going on chief counsels were scarcely getting their desks open and their chairs warm before they passed on. It is safe to say that not a member of the Shipping Board could offhand name all the chief counselors who have for a brief moment held sway in the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation and then passed on after undoing most of the work of their predecessors, and, in turn, having their work undone.

Six comptrollers have graced the organization in seven years, and when the general personnel is considered thousands would be required to express the numbers which have come and gone.

Hundreds of millions of dollars worth of supplies and materials have been sold under various supply and sales directors who have succeeded one another in a manner similar to the other officials.

And yet to-day the Shipping Board has no policy. It has no settled operating program. It has no settled personnel. It has no object in the future except the one solitary purpose which has always actuated the officials of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation—to get the ships into the hands of privateers as cheaply and as quickly as possible, to get as much money for the private interests as possible, to make Government ownership and operation as unprofitable and as much of a failure as possible, and to allow the private shipping interests to make as much at the expense of the Government as possible.

What business—steel, coal, railroad, any private business—could exist under such misrule, such a changing of policies, directors, officers, and personnel? None but the Government's business, where the taxpayers can be called upon to dig deep and provide the golden flood poured by the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation into the insatiable maw of waste, graft, and profiteering of private interests.

And all this while the ships, tied up, are rusting and falling to the bottom of the oceans at their anchorages.

Still in a stage of experimenting, still calling upon Congress for appropriations mounting to millions annually, still concealing from Congress and the country every detail of this wasteful business and disgraceful fiasco which grows greater year by year, the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation have no more idea to-day what policy they will finally determine upon or what will be done to give this country a merchant marine than the first Shipping Board had—hardly as much, in fact, for conditions are worse now than then, the ships are more nearly gone—and in a few more years naught will remain of the proud fleet but rusting hulks; naught will remain of the mountain of materials; naught will remain of the funds; and if another war should come another colossal, disgraceful, dishonest, plundering program of shipbuilding will have to be undertaken, to be run in the same way by the same men as the last one was, "because they have had experience."

From the ruinous mistakes of the first board to the present day we have heard the same cry as board succeeded board, official succeeded official, as policy succeeded policy, and that cry was, "Now give us a chance to show what we can do." And we did give them the chance, and they showed us all right. And to-day we will hear that same cry: "Give the new board and the new head of the Fleet Corporation a chance to show what they can do." Congress must not investigate. Oh, no! Congress must just appropriate the people's millions and ask no questions and give each succeeding set of officials a chance to show what they can do; and God knows so far each set has done worse than its predecessors. What can we expect of the present set?

Waste? Certainly there has been waste; far more than enough to have paid the soldier boys an adjusted compensation comparable to the wages paid in the shipyards and cantonments during the palmiest days of the cost-plus contractor while war waged.

Graft? Yes; there has been enough money grafted to make a tax reduction of ample proportions easy if we but had it back this year.

How could the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation escape waste and graft; how could any business escape waste and graft with such an ever-changing, never-determined purpose, shifting policies, and procession of directors, officials, executives, and personnel?

Graft and waste are inevitable under such conditions. They have been, they will be, and this Congress can make up its mind to continue to pour millions into this sink of waste and graft, of mistake and mismanagement, unless it has the courage to face the issue, investigate, determine a merchant-marine policy, declare a purpose, and then require the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation to follow that policy, or else wipe them both out.

The officials and executives have been drawn by the board from where? From the private shipping concerns who did not want to see Government operation succeed and who wanted to ruin the effort of the Government to get anything out of its ships.

Where did those officials go after they strutted their brief hour on the quarterdeck of the American merchant marine and did the bidding of their masters? Why, where but back to the private shipping interests?

Who determined the operating policies?

Who but the private steamship operators' associations?

And for whose profit would those associations and private operators lay down policies to be followed by the Shipping Board? Who, indeed, but for the profit of themselves?

Can you imagine the independent oil companies turning their business over to the officials of the Oil Trust to run for them? Can you imagine the independent oil companies asking their rivals, the Oil Trust, to lay down the policy of operation?

What business could succeed under such absurd and criminal conditions? Yet, that is what the Shipping Board has done—the while telling Congress that it must not know what is going on because it might embarrass some of the operators.

It is high time we investigated this whole situation, else we will later rue it.

And all this time we have not been within gunshot of a merchant marine. These billions have not gotten us more than one-sixth of a merchant marine—a fleet of ships—and that fleet is being squandered, given away, or is rusting and sinking, flake by flake, to the oceans' bottoms, tied up at the docks.

What is a merchant marine? Is it a fleet of ships only? Why a fleet of ships is to a merchant marine just what a string of boxcars is to a railroad; no more.

Then, what does constitute a merchant marine?

1. Something to haul.
2. Some place to haul it to.
3. Something to haul it in. (Ships.)
4. Somebody to buy it.
5. Some way for the buyer to pay for it.
6. Something to bring back.

When we haul something somewhere to sell it to somebody the buyer has to pay not only for the actual cost of production and the producer's profit, the haul from farm or factory to railroad, the rail cost of transportation, the water-transportation cost, the labor of handling, the depreciation in transit, but the speculative profits loaded on by the gamblers in between the point of production and the point of consumption.

So that brings in a question of production costs, elimination of speculative profits, proper rail rates, proper handling charges, proper care of products in transit, and a market which can absorb the shipments.

The buyer must be able to pay for the goods or we can not have a merchant marine, because we can not afford to haul goods for nothing and then give them away.

And you can not operate a merchant marine or a fleet of ships full one way and empty the other. The Shipping Boards for seven years have tried to do that, and apparently they have not found out yet that it can not be profitably done.

So we must figure on something to bring back.

The ability of the buyer to pay brings us up to the whole situation of the rest of the world—rehabilitation of foreign credits, stabilization of foreign currency, prosperity of foreign countries, and all that.

The question of return cargo involves the entire tariff question.

Yet unless you have all six of these elements—the goods, the market, the ships to haul the goods, the ability of purchasers to pay, and return cargoes—you have not a merchant marine.

And we have squandered nearly five billions on a fleet of ships, paid out millions in $35,000-a-year salaries fooling with a fleet of ships and calling it a merchant marine, a group of foolish men playing with a string of box cars standing on a siding, pushing them to and fro, and believing they had a railroad!

What are the values and purposes of a merchant marine—if we ever get one or are ever to have one?

1. Peace-time value—hauling of products to foreign markets, coastwise transportation and so on.

2. War-time value—a convertible fleet for transport service, for serving naval bases, for an armed merchant service, etc.

Does any Member of this House suppose the Shipping Board knows anything about any of these questions? Does it know the peace-time value or the war-time value of the merchant marine in dollars and cents?

Does any Member of this House believe the Shipping Board can give us constructive information and advice on the question of production cost, rail cost, speculative profits, labor costs, foreign credits, the tariff—all these things which are intimately related to a merchant marine—questions which must be solved before we have even begun to achieve a chance to have a merchant marine?

We should investigate. Put a stop to this child's play, to the waste, the grafting, the preying upon the Treasury by the private interests. Determine the actual worth, peace-time and war-time, of a merchant marine. Determine the cost of having one. Figure out how much the people must pay to have a merchant marine—then let the people who have to foot the bill know. Determine a policy—and make the Shipping Board follow it long enough to know whether it will be successful.

Put a stop to this farce of spending millions and hundreds of millions on one-sixth of a merchant marine and calling it the whole marine.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me five minutes on this resolution?

Mr. SNELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this could be a very expensive resolution. If the committee is going into an exhaustive, earnest, and sincere investigation of this Shipping Board, the money spent will be worth while, but if it is not to be an effective, earnest effort upon the part of the committee to get the facts and clean up the Shipping Board where it needs cleaning, it is going to be money wasted.

I am not in favor of as broad authority to spend money in any resolution as this gives this committee. Under this language the committee could sit anywhere it desires, all over the United States, and force our contingent fund to pay all of its expenses.

Under the language of the resolution this committee if it saw fit could divide itself up into subdivisions and they could not only sit anywhere in the United States that they saw fit, but they could sit anywhere in the world, with no limitation whatever on expenses. They could sit in every foreign country in existence and force our contingent fund to pay the expenses. They could sit anywhere, even after we adjourn Congress, if they so desired. It permits unrestricted junketing trips all over the world. Personally, I am not in favor of any such resolution. With the purpose of the resolution I am in sympathy, for this Shipping Board should be exhaustively investigated, but there ought to be some kind of limitation in the resolution to protect the Treasury.

Of course this is going to pass. I am just wasting the time of the House in making this feeble protest, but I can not sit here and merely vote against a resolution or permit it to pass without raising some kind of a protest. I am against this broad provision. I am against this unlimited authority to spend public money. I am against this unrestricted right of the committee to sit anywhere and at any time at the expense of the people of the United States. And I shall vote against the resolution unless the committee now having it in charge amends it with proper limitations. The chairman has the power to keep any member from offering an amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, I think this should be said. This resolution follows substantially the form of resolutions that have been passed in regard to various investigations heretofore. Broad powers were given the committee because it is essential that broad powers be given in order to attain the end that must be attained if the investigation is to be of service. It is quite true that the committee has authority to sit at other places than the city of Washington. That is frequently given committees. Personally, I have never known it to be abused in any way. As a matter of fact it very frequently happens where there are a large number of witnesses to be examined as, for instance, in the city of New York, as may happen in this case, or at any other seaport towns or cities, it is real economy for the committee to go there rather than to summon a large number of witnesses here. It saves money.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to remind the minority leader of what occurred when the Walsh subcommittee of the Graham committee went in a special train to the Pacific coast and lived up and down that Pacific coast for about two months. Whatever, if any, good came out of that investigation and of the $700,000 of the people's money that was spent?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the gentleman states a larger amount than was really expended.

Mr. BLANTON. It was between six and seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think good did come out of that investigation and I think good will come out of this investigation.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman have any objection to stating upon whose initiative this proposed action is taken?

Mr. SNELL. The original motion was introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. I simply want to say, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said, that if we have no limitation upon this investigation it could not be said that the investigation was in any wise to be hampered and it could not be said that we did not want a full and free investigation. We followed the usual language used in giving power to such a committee. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MUSCLE SHOALS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio presents a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 169.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 518. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 10 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the acting chairman and some member of the Military Affairs Committee opposed to this bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall arise and report the bill to the House, with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has the unanimous support of the Committee on Rules. Speaking for myself, I frankly say that I am opposed to the bill; opposed to it because it involves a very radical departure from the established policy of the United States relating to water power, particularly as embodied in the water power act of 1920. Again, I regard the offer which it is proposed to accept as grossly, I may say ridiculously, inadequate. The committee, however, thought that this proposition, which has been pending before the Congress for some years, should be taken up and disposed of, and hence we reported it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, while the gentleman is on his feet, could he briefly outline what he means by the policy of the Government in respect to water power merely in a word?

Mr. BURTON. Retaining control, providing for the utilization of water power for the general welfare, for the general interest, limiting the franchises to 50 years, and there are a number of other provisions which I will set forth more fully in the course of the discussion.

I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] desires recognition, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I congratulate the House of Representatives, and I feel I am also justified in congratulating the country that after practically two years of delay for an opportunity for the consideration of this very important matter we have at last arrived at a time when the House of Representatives will be given an opportunity to pass judgment upon it. I am glad to know that, according to the statement of the distinguished Representative from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], that there is probably no opposition to the adoption of this rule—the motion to report—which I had the pleasure of making in the Committee on Rules, and therefore I shall not discuss that phase of the situation.

I want to say in the beginning, gentlemen, that I am heartily and unreservedly in favor of the unconditional acceptance of the offer made to the Government by Henry Ford. I have taken that position from the beginning and will maintain it until we win this fight. Within the limited time that I have for opening this discussion it will not be possible for me to attempt to go into a discussion of the details of that offer. That will be very elaborately discussed in the debates that are to follow by those who are in favor and those who are opposed to the proposition. There is, however, one phase of this whole problem to which I desire to call the earnest attention of the Members of the House, and I particularly desire, if I am so fortunate as to receive it, the attention of those Representatives who do not reside in and who do not represent southern constituencies, because there has somehow or other crept into the general atmosphere of the consideration of this vital problem a feeling in some quarters that this is a sectional proposition. Gentlemen, there is involved in the ultimate consideration of this question and in the proper solution of the problem involved the greatest and most vital economic matter that to-day confronts the representatives of the American people, and that problem is the reclamation of the fertility of the soil of the United States of America. That phase of the matter I desire to discuss.

Where is the public man who at some time in his career has not described in glowing terms the marvelous agricultural resources of these United States? How often have we pointed with pride to the undeniable fact that America leads the world in the amount and in the value of the agricultural products which she produces annually. To predict a food shortage in a country that produces 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn and 700,000,000 bushels of wheat every year would sound ridiculous to the average man, but, gentlemen, there was a time when such a prediction would have appeared equally ridiculous in India or in China. To-day the world knows all too well that millions of people in these countries need but one crop failure to bring them face to face with actual starvation.

I am not an alarmist; I do not believe that the American people are in any immediate danger of starvation, but I want to say to this House that agriculture in the United States for the past 300 years has been following the identical road which has brought the great countries beyond the seas to their present precarious situation. True, we have produced and still produce enormous crops, but we have produced them and still produce them at the price of our soil fertility. Theodore Roosevelt, the great conservationist, called attention to this situation, and said:

> I have always been deeply impressed with Liebig's statement that it was the decrease of soil fertility, and not either peace or war, which was fundamental in bringing about the decadence of nations. While unquestionably nations have been destroyed by other causes, I have become convinced that it was the destruction of the soil itself which was, perhaps, the most fatal of all causes.

The population of the United States increases at an average rate of about one and one-half million people annually—this means a population of 140,000,000 in 1940—but the number of acres of land which can be placed in cultivation in the United States is definitely limited. In the past we have met the needs of our increasing population by increasing the acreage in cultivation, but recent studies clearly show that we have nearly reached the limit of increase in lands cultivated, and that in the future we must depend upon a larger yield per acre from lands already in cultivation.

There are two ways in which a given amount of land can be made to produce more crops. One way is by more intensive cultivation, which means putting more people to work on the farm. The tendency in the United States, however, is exactly the opposite of this, for instead of having more labor on our farms we find that every year more and more people desert the farms for the cities. High costs of production on the farm has made it necessary for the farmer to get high prices for his products in order to break even, and it is well known the farmer has not been able to get these high prices, and as a result last year no less than 2,000,000 people gave up their effort of trying to get a living out of the soil, and moved to town. There were also some 900,000 who left the town for the country, leaving a net loss of 1,120,000, or nearly 4 per cent of the entire farm population. The largest decrease was in the South Atlantic States, from Maryland to Florida, where 324,000 people, or more than 5 per cent of the farm population, gave up and quit.

The other method of increased production is through greater yields per acre with the same labor, and this can be accomplished only by good farming methods combined with a liberal supply of fertilizers.

Fertilizer is the farmer's labor-saving device. Results at experiment stations show that with corn and oats the use of fertilizer enables two men to do the work of three men without it.

With wheat the effect of using fertilizer properly is to give one man the food-producing power of two men. With cotton the efforts of one man aided by fertilizer will produce food and clothing equal to that of three men without the fertilizer.

Now that the best of our lands are already in cultivation and no more virgin soil awaits the settler, we will do well to encourage a type of agriculture that will maintain the producing capacity of our cultivated lands. That this has not been done up to the present time is evidenced by the fact that in the East and the North and the South there are large acreages where farming has been abandoned because under present methods it is no longer profitable, for the soil has been so nearly exhausted that it no longer repays its cultivation.

To those who still incline to the belief that the question of maintaining soil fertility is of special interest only to the South, the results disclosed by the last census and by a number of State surveys will be illuminating.

In the New England States, together with New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, census statistics show that during the 40 years between 1880 and 1920 the population has somewhat more than doubled, but the lands in cultivation have decreased by nearly 14,000,000 acres, or about 30 per cent of the whole. This means, Mr. Chairman, that every year for the past 40 years an average of 340,000 acres has been abandoned in those nine States alone.

It was the farming population from these New England States which settled the fertile plains of the Middle West, and year after year they are repeating there the same process of draining the fertility from the soil and returning little or none of the millions of tons of plant foods that are shipped away in every crop. Improved means for plowing, harrowing, sowing, cultivating, and harvesting in such a plan of operations merely hasten the time when these soils also will become so exhausted that they too can not produce a crop without the aid of fertilizer.

This yield per acre is not only falling off in the East and Middle West. Consider for a moment what has happened in the beet-sugar industry in the far Western States of Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, Idaho, and California. The census returns for 1909–1919 show that there has been a decrease in yield per acre from 12 per cent in Colorado to practically 40 per cent in Idaho. What is the cause of this? Let us quote from the Department of Agriculture's bulletin on the production of sugar beets. The department says:

> If the soil is lacking in fertility, the roots may be too small to produce sufficient tonnage to make the crop profitable to the grower. * * * In those sugar-beet sections where this crop has been grown for a number of years without proper attention to the maintenance of soil fertility and an adequate supply of humus this yield of sugar beets has been reduced. There are few sugar-beet areas in which the soil fertility has been maintained or improved to the limit of possibilities. It is apparent, therefore, that by proper attention to soil conditions from the standpoint of fertility the average yield of beets per acre may be greatly increased. (Bull. 721, U. S. Department of Agriculture.)

Here is an industry in which labor constitutes from 69 to 75 per cent of all costs, exclusive of land rent, and since it costs as much to plant and cultivate a small crop as it does a large one, the economic advantage of a large yield per acre is immediately evident. All of these advantages depend upon a low price for the fertilizer, and cheap fertilizer, whether nitrogen or phosphoric acid, calls for cheap electric power. If, therefore, we turn this power over to the exploitation of private power companies to be loaded up with securities on which a good return is expected, companies which are in the market to make all they can out of the business and who propose to charge for the power the highest rates which the public-service commissions will permit, we may expect to find the farmer deprived of his cheap fertilizer by the prohibitive costs of the power. In contrast with this we have the offer of Henry Ford providing for production to the full capacity of nitrate plant No. 2 under the most improved methods and with but a single profit, and that limited to 8 per cent on the fair actual annual cost of production.

Of all the sections of the country, these western sugar-beet areas should not suffer for lack of modern high-grade fertilizer. No section of the country is so abundantly provided with water power for taking nitrogen from the air. In these Western States are to be found phosphate deposits that are the largest in the world, awaiting only cheap power applied in the electric furnace to concentrate them and make them available for economical use.

There in the West are the potash lakes, this country's only source of the third element of plant food, which is so necessary to sugar beets. Whatever cheap combination of these fertilizers is worked out at Muscle Shoals by Henry Ford can be made available to these sugar-beet farmers from the raw fertilizer materials of the far West, and the increased production which is so necessary to success in sugar-beet raising can be brought about by the liberal application of these high-grade fertilizers at low cost.

Instances are on record—

Says the Department of Agriculture—

> where the yield of sugar beets has been raised from 9 or 10 tons per acre up to 16 or 18 tons per acre, apparently entirely through the application of manure. (Bull. 726, U. S. Department of Agriculture.)

The value to the sugar-beet industry of the development of cheap and efficient chemical manures is beyond question, and I say without hesitation that the working out of this problem at Muscle Shoals under the Ford offer will mean more to the prosperity of the sugar-beet districts of the Middle and far West than any other improvement in their industry.

To the west of the central plains of the Mississippi Valley there are large tracts of waste lands, some of which can be made to yield bountiful crops when supplied with sufficient water. In the South and Southeast there are thousands of acres of swamp lands which require drainage and clearing to make them available to the crops, while in the mountain sections and in our fast-disappearing regions of heavy timber there are large acreages of cut-over lands which could be made available by clearing and grubbing.

There are, then, in general four ways in which we can increase our acreage of producing farm lands in this country. First, by supplying water to arid soil; second, by draining the limited areas of swamp lands along the coast and in the river bottoms; third, by clearing and grubbing the cut-over lands of the forested regions; and fourth, by providing fertilizers at low cost to reclaim an ever-increasing acreage of well-located farm lands by making their cultivation once more profitable.

While this Government has never recognized a national policy of soil maintenance, our farmers have been forced to recognize it, and in 1920 the fertilizer bill of this country was $326,400,000. This is no mere sectional problem, for Michigan farmers spend more for fertilizers than Mississippi. Missouri, not generally regarded as a fertilizer-using State, spends more for fertilizers than Louisiana with its heavily fertilized fields of sugar cane. Pennsylvania, whose Representatives have seemed to feel that this subject had no especial interest for them, is a State which spends many millions more for fertilizer than does Alabama with all her cotton fields. New York Members have also opposed every proposition that has heretofore been offered for the operation of a great fertilizer industry at Muscle Shoals, and yet in 1919 the farmers of New York State paid a million dollars more for fertilizer than the farmers of Alabama did, for the New York farmers' bill amounted to some $15,000,000. New Jersey is not a large State, but her farmers spent more for fertilizer than all the fruit growers and winter truck and vegetable raisers of the State of Florida. There are counties in Texas larger than the whole State of Connecticut, but Connecticut farmers spent nearly three times as much for fertilizer as all the farmers combined in the great Lone Star State. There have been gentlemen from Ohio who have not taken kindly to the establishment of a fertilizer industry at Muscle Shoals, and yet Ohio farmers spent more for fertilizer than all the farmers of Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Texas combined.

The most rapid increase in the use of fertilizers, Mr. Chairman, is not in the South nor in the East, but in the Middle West, particularly in the so-called nonfertilizer-using States west of the Mississippi River. Oklahoma leads all the States with an increase between 1909 and 1919 of 1,455 per cent in the expenditures of her farmers for fertilizer. Kansas is not far behind with 1,193 per cent increase. Her farmers in 1909 spent practically nothing for fertilizers, but 10 years later their combined expenditures amounted to nearly $1,000,000 for this single item.

The increase in North Dakota was over 1,000 per cent and was almost equaled by the increase in Montana. Oregon, Arizona, Wisconsin, and Washington were all above 500 per cent increase, and then we come to Missouri; her farmers increased their purchases from $671,000 to nearly $4,000,000 per annum. Minnesota, with 479 per cent increase, can no longer say that her farmers are not concerned with the subject of fertilizers, and the gentleman from Iowa, who is opposing all plans so far proposed for establishing a great fertilizer industry at Muscle Shoals, comes from a State whose farmers paid $600,000 in 1919 for fertilizers while they paid only $100,000 in 1909, and their increase was 444 per cent.

I wonder if this House really appreciates what 444 per cent increase means! Suppose that our friend from Iowa was in the habit of paying $100 for clothing and suddenly was notified that hereafter he would have to pay an increase of 444 per cent. That would mean, gentleman, that his expense for this item would be increased by $444 and his tailor's bill, instead of being $100, would be $544!

Is it surprising then that the farmers throughout the country have insisted that their rights shall be protected in the disposition of the Muscle Shoals project? Remember that it was the farmers who first advocated the establishment of the nitrogen industry at Muscle Shoals and that it was to serve agriculture in time of peace that the Muscle Shoals project was undertaken. Shall we now leave their interests in the hands of the power companies and trust these power companies to work out the farmers' fertilizer problem, when the aim and end of these power monopolists is to sell all the power they can in the public utility market at the highest price they can get?

I could carry these comparisons much further, but I think I have said enough to leave no doubt in your minds that the question of the preservation of soil fertility and the reclamation of our abandoned farm lands is not a sectional question but a national one that we can not afford to ignore. If it is a sound national policy to invest $141,000,000 to reclaim a million acres of arid lands in the far West by utilizing the flow of our streams to make these arid lands productive, then, gentlemen, I maintain that it is a sound national policy to reclaim and return to cultivation the 14,000,000 acres of abandoned farm lands in the North Atlantic States and many more millions of acres in the South Atlantic and Gulf States by utilizing the waters of our navigable streams like the Tennessee River to "fix" the nitrogen of the air cheaply and conveniently so that the cultivation of these lands can once more become profitable.

If it were necessary to make the investment for this purpose without the return of any interest at all, we would be amply justified in doing so by what we have already done in our reclamation work, for there is no pretense of returning any rate of interest whatever from our irrigation projects, but here comes an industrial genius offering us 4 per cent on the money required to complete a dam which we were about to abandon and further offering to take over a great nitrate plant which we were about to scrap, and to operate it in the manufacture of fertilizers for 100 years, seeking out and employing the most advanced and economical processes for the purpose.

Our national system of land reclamation, like our national superpower program, should begin in our navigable streams, with the development of hydroelectric power at a low rate of interest under a definite agreement whereby the power will be used in a large way for the production of cheaper and higher grade fertilizers, not only at Muscle Shoals but in many other places throughout the country. Such a national policy should be followed on the St. Lawrence for the benefit of the farmers of New England instead of turning over this great power to the General Electric Co., the Aluminum Co. of America, and the Du Pont Co. Such a policy should be followed at the proposed Boulder Dam on the Colorado River for the benefit of western farmers and at many other great power sites.

I do not maintain that all the great powers of the country should be used exclusively for producing fertilizers any more than I maintain that the Muscle Shoals power should be used exclusively for this purpose; we need other things besides fertilizer. The opportunity is here, however, to start a great nitrogen industry in this country which is certain to become the backbone of modern fertilizer production conducted on a scientific basis and using modern methods, not for the benefit of stockholders, but for the benefit of agriculture. If such a domestic nitrogen industry does no more than to eliminate the Chilean export duty, it will save our nitrate consumers no less than $550,000,000 in the next 50 years.

The passage of the McKenzie bill is the first step in such a national program of soil reclamation and preservation with a guaranteed output of nitrogen sufficient for 2,000,000 tons of 2-8-2 commercial fertilizer supplied in a mixture with other plant foods, according to demand.

The fundamental question with nations, as with individuals, is the question of daily bread. We may aspire to be great scientists, great merchants, or great manufacturers, but first of all we must have something to eat. America's supremacy has been founded from the beginning on her agricultural wealth, but our agriculture is already on the decline, and although we are the youngest of the great nations we already import large quantities of food supplies.

Gentlemen of the House, as long as the costs of production on the farms are so high that the price which the farmer receives will not yield him a fair return for his time and his investment, we may expect to see our agriculture continue to decline, and let no man delude himself with the mistaken notion that under such conditions our cities can continue to thrive and prosper.

We must continue the work of our reclamation service undismayed by the disappointments which are only to be expected in the early years of a great enterprise involving such a large agricultural risk. But we should bear in mind that the service to the farmer which will grow out of the development of a great domestic nitrogen industry, begun under the Ford offer at Muscle Shoals, will be a reclamation service that will apply to the 500,000,000 acres which constitute our cultivated area, and admittedly it will result in a saving to our farmers exceeding $150,000,000 every year, and will make our farmers forever independent of combinations of greedy foreign interests, in obtaining their supplies of the plant foods that are so necessary to the permanence of American agriculture.

I want to say a word now particularly to my friends from New England. I have here a statement issued a few days ago by the mayor of one of your great cotton-spinning centers, Fall River, Mass.

It reads:

SOUTHERN CAPITAL CAUSES EAST'S BIG MILLS TO CLOSE.—NEW ENGLAND'S GREAT INDUSTRY CRIPPLED WHEN TWELVE PLANTS QUIT.—FALL RIVER IS CENTER OF INDUSTRIAL DESPAIR.—GOVERNMENT BESEECHED WITH PLEAS FOR INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS.

FALL RIVER, MASS., February 26.—Over half a million New Englanders directly dependent upon the cotton mills affected by the drastic shutdowns await with keen interest the answer of Washington to Mayor Talbot's indignant demand for a Federal investigation.

The Fall River mayor, who has made his appeal to President Coolidge and the Federal Trade Commission, declares that this city is in dire distress from the general "plan" of curtailment in operation.

Twelve local mills have discharged their help, closed the gates and gone out of business, all because, Mayor Talbot declares, "Southern capital and competition amid New England's greatest industry" has put them out of business.

Operatives, living a hand-to-mouth existence in many cases; merchants, dependent upon the "help" for their own success, and landlords looking to both workers and merchants for their share, are beginning to despair, Fall River being a "one industry" city.

The situation is said to be the result of conditions in two markets. The price of raw cotton is unusually high and the manufacturers are holding off. On the other hand, jobbers and retailers will not buy the finished product at prices which allow the mills a profit at the existing cost of the raw material.

SOUTH MAKES GAINS.

They have turned to the southern markets, purchasing the finished product at prices less than the cost of manufacturing in the local mills.

In this situation the big mills appear to have adopted a course almost as old as their industry, that which is called "curtailment." As their critics phrase it, they "pass the buck" to thousands of operatives, who are already about the poorest paid people in any of the world's great industries.

Now that local trade begins to feel the pinch and bankers have taken note of it, members of the local governments in a dozen New England cities are to follow the example of Mayor Talbot.

"Something has got to be done and without delay," declared Mayor Talbot in his Washington communication. "The residents of this city are without food or money, in some cases without proper shelter. It is only right that a sweeping investigation of the textile situation in this country be made.

"We have long felt the sting of southern competition here, but the situation is now acute. Our people must live, and the continued curtailment of the mills of this city, which is the largest cotton manufacturing city in the world, is causing great hardship and untold suffering to the majority who are mill operatives."

Ten or twelve of the great cotton mills of that city, employing thousands and tens of thousands of laborers, are to-day closed down and their operatives thrown out of employment, and in a few weeks may be thrown on the charity of those communities. And what does the mayor of this New England city give as the reason for the closing down of these cotton mills up in New England? He attributed it, and attributed it properly, to the high cost of cotton. The price of cotton is so high and labor conditions are such that they can not compete successfully with the cotton factories of the South. How is that condition going to be remedied? By cheapening the production of cotton? How can that be done, gentlemen, except by cheapening the cost of commercial fertilizer?

That is the only way. On every country road down in my country to-day and in all that cotton-producing section of the country you meet farmer after farmer going from the town to his farm with a wagon load of fertilizer, on which he is paying exorbitant profit to the Chilean Nitrate Trust and to the Fertilizer Trust here in America.

It does not do the southern farmer or cotton producer any good, as my friends from the South well know, to sell for 35 cents cotton which costs them 40 cents to produce. But that is the situation, and the cost of the commercial fertilizer is the big overhead burden. We will soon see how anxious our New England friends are to help their idle cotton mills when they vote on this bill.

I want to say a word to my friends from the congested centers of population in this country, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and I know something about those conditions, because I lived in the great city of New York two years in my earlier manhood, in the great district now represented by my friend O'CONNOR, the old Tammany Hall district. I know how crowded they are; I know that to-day, as then, the laborers, clothed in overalls, go out and earn a pittance of a wage, and most of it goes to the purchase of clothing and food and shelter. Where do they get that food? From the truck producers of the adjacent territory. And what is the big item of cost in the production of truck articles? Commercial fertilizer. The only way to reduce the cost of food to your people is to lower the original cost of production.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BURTON. Or, rather, a suggestion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Make it a question, because the gentleman will have time in which to make suggestions.

Mr. BURTON. The question is this: Does not the gentleman from Alabama realize that the opponents of this measure are just as anxious to provide fertilizer as the advocates, but they believe that your bill is not fair to the people and not the best way of securing that fertilizer?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not agree with the gentleman that he is as anxious to provide fertilizer as we are. If you were you would be supporting this bill this day, because your own minority report, which the distinguished gentleman from Ohio will so vigorously support upon this floor, does not even have the temerity to recommend the adoption of a single one of those other fertilizer propositions. [Applause.] And here is the only chance you have. But you want delay; that is all. That has been the program all the time and you are going to continue it to the last ditch. We are not being deceived by the attitude of certain gentlemen upon the floor of this House for further delay when it has already been delayed two years.

Mr. Ford has made a proposition to Congress and he says, "You can either accept or reject it." And a nonpartisan majority of the great Committee on Military Affairs has earnestly recommended the acceptance of Mr. Ford's offer unconditionally, and you will hear some very able arguments by the acting chairman of that committee, a Republican, and by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the chairman of your great Committee on Appropriations. He is a man who is attempting to serve the best interests of this country heartily and with great industry and intelligence. You will hear other arguments made by men on your side of the House as to why this proposition should be accepted.

And the basic principle is that it provides an adequate supply, as far as we can now get it, of cheap commercial fertilizer, and, gentlemen, do not forget this basic proposition:

When the Congress of the United States originally authorized the expenditure of money for the construction of this plant it had in mind only two things, as written in the law authorizing those appropriations. One was the national defense, the manufacture of explosives, and the other, as expressed in that bill, was for the manufacture of cheaper commercial fertilizer for the farmers of America. Nothing was in contemplation at that time, in the will and opinion of Congress, with reference to the utilization of the excess water power at Muscle Shoals. Congress has adopted a separate policy along lines of the development of water power as covered by the water power act, and we now have a great Federal tribunal administering that phase of our economic development.

But here was a proposition conceived originally and dedicated only to the two purposes which I have mentioned, and here is the only opportunity that the farmers of America, wherever they reside and in whatever business activity they may be engaged as far as the quality of their production is concerned—here, I say, is an opportunity, a businesslike opportunity, backed by adequate capital, backed by a man in whom I believe the American people as a whole have confidence—certainly as to his capacity and his willingness to carry out the terms of his contract, to carry out the original intention of Congress.

In conclusion, I do desire to appeal to you, not in any sectional way, because it is not a sectional question, and not in any partisan way, because it can not possibly be distorted into a partisan issue, but upon the fundamental basis of a real and reasonable opportunity to put these plants to work for the benefit of the farmers of America. This proposition, gentlemen, is too big in its fundamental aspects; it covers too wide a field of important possibilities for the future to be considered upon any other basis than a calm and judicial consideration of what is involved in it and the possibilities for American agriculture that lie wrapped up in it; and I say to you that my chief interest in this proposition is based upon giving to the farmers of America, wherever located, in Maine, California, Michigan, or Alabama, a fair and reasonable opportunity to have this absolutely essential element of their production furnished them at a reasonable and fair cost, and not be subjected in all the years to come, as they have in all the years that have passed, to the exorbitant demands and the exorbitant profits of the Chilian nitrate trust of $10 a ton, and also to the price that is fixed by this combination of American fertilizer producers. I say here is an opportunity to emancipate the American farmers from this thraldom they have so long endured, and surely, gentlemen, in view of their condition in the country, in view of your expressed anxiety, and that of your President, to do something to relieve their condition and to make profits possible, so they may continue to occupy the soil. I appeal to you gentlemen to give to this proposition, the only hope they have ever had for an amelioration of these hard conditions, your favorable support and action in the final vote upon this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time, reserving two minutes, to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL].

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Alabama was speaking in the time of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; in my own time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio then has 55 minutes remaining.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, Mr. Speaker; the agreement was 30 minutes to the side.

The SPEAKER. No such agreement was made publicly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I tried to call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to that fact.

The SPEAKER. Such an agreement could not be made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was the understanding between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and myself.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, then, that the time be limited to 30 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to 30 minutes on the side. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HILL] is recognized for 25 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. HILL of Maryland was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.]

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I agree with almost everything that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has said except as to the Ford offer itself. This whole question of the disposition of Muscle Shoals is one of vital importance, not merely to the Southern States within a radius of several hundred miles of Muscle Shoals, but it is a question of great importance to the future of this country. It is not a sectional question. It is not a partisan question. It is a very great economic question. It is a very serious problem, and after two years of very earnest consideration of this problem by the Military Affairs Committee of the House and by the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate I personally am very glad to see this matter brought before the House for final disposition.

I wish to speak to the House from no sectional standpoint and from no partisan standpoint.

There are two propositions involved, as I see it, before this House, both propositions claiming to arrive at the same ultimate goal; two propositions aimed at a goal which no one in this House can fail to entirely agree with. The great Government project at Muscle Shoals was started on two great principles which are of vital importance to the whole Nation. Muscle Shoals, the Wilson Dam, the nitrate plants No. 1 and No. 2, all of that great project, should be regarded from the point of view of fertilizer in time of peace and nitrates in time of war. It is a dual proposition, and for that reason the House Military Affairs Committee was assigned the duty of holding the hearings and making the reports, and the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate had the same function.

Personally, when the Military Affairs Committee began its study of this project, I regarded it—and I say this to the House to show the point of view of a Member of the House without any particular original information on the subject—when we first began the study of this project I was entirely in favor of the Ford proposal. I felt that Muscle Shoals was one more of the Great War projects temporarily brought into existence for war purposes, and I felt that it should be disposed of at the best possible cash advantage. At that time there was no other offer. At that time no other proposition had been elicited from any interest in this country, and I personally felt that the Ford offer should be promptly accepted.

Coming as I do from a city district, I was not then awake to the very serious problems underlying the production of nitrates for fertilizer, and I again say that I agree with everything on that subject of fertilizer which has been so well and clearly brought out by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. The Military Affairs Committee of the House and the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate made an inspection tour of Muscle Shoals, and I had not been there more than about three hours when I realized that the Muscle Shoals project was a national proposition and not one confined to a small portion of one of our States.

I desire in the time that I have merely to present certain general considerations. You gentlemen of the House have before you two propositions. One is embodied in the McKenzie bill and the other is embodied in the Hull bill. One, the McKenzie bill, is a proposition made by Mr. Ford; the other is a proposition made by a number of power companies who have agreed to form one $15,000,000 nitrate fertilizer and power company.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is the proposition in the Hull bill, made by the power companies, recommended by any members of your committee?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes; I recommend it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman say that while he admits it is a better proposition than the Ford proposition, he does not specifically recommend its adoption?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I signed the minority report of the Military Affairs Committee with a number of others agreeing with everything they said in the report, and I am also in favor of the passage of the Hull bill with certain amendments which is substantially the combined proposition of the southern power companies for one corporation which shall be a nitrate plant and also power company.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is unfortunate that the gentleman, in submitting the report to Congress, did not say so. As I read the report it is not contained in it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The gentleman realizes that when a number of members of a committee sign a report it represents the consensus of opinion of those signing it and is not necessarily the fullest proposition of all individual views.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I can not at this moment. I decline to yield for a few minutes because I want to get this matter more or less succinctly before the House.

There are these two propositions before the House, the Ford proposition as contained in the McKenzie bill and the Power & Nitrate Co.'s proposition contained in the Hull bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman answer one question?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. No; I can not yield at this moment. I personally favor the passage of the Hull bill, and I think the reasons in favor of the Hull bill are clearly set forth in the report of the minority. There has been very great interest in this question throughout the whole of the United States. There has rarely been any subject before this House in which there have been stronger views taken for or against a proposition. I admit, and as an American I am glad to admit, the ability and business sagacity and success of Mr. Henry Ford, but I do not think this proposition should be considered on any other basis than the basis of the actual facts.

Henry Ford is 61 years old. Under his proposition the Ford offer does not and can not become completely operative for six years, and under this proposition Henry Ford's personal responsibility ceases when the Government has turned over the Government's interests to the corporation to be formed. There is in the McKenzie bill no guaranty on behalf of Mr. Ford or anybody else individually for the functioning of the corporation that is to be created. The only guaranty on the part of Ford is that the $10,000,000 corporation shall be created.

As our colleague from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD, said, it is quite impossible in a brief time to go over all the details of this proposition. They will be taken up by those who favor the Hull bill in detail by subsequent speakers. I desire especially to call the attention of the House to a matter that was new to me until within the last two or three days, and that is the very great change in the Muscle Shoals situation within the last two years. There are two nitrate plants at Muscle Shoals. There is No. 1 nitrate plant and No. 2 nitrate plant. When we visited these plants two years ago we were told that the No. 1 nitrate plant, which was the German Haber process plant, had never produced one ounce of nitrate; that we had not during the war period been able successfully to apply in the Muscle Shoals plant the Haber process. We were told that the plant could only be scrapped, and we then went through the acre after acre of the nitrate plant No. 2.

Gentlemen of the House, this is a fabulously large project, upon which the Government has spent enormous sums of money. We were told two years ago that No. 1 plant was not a plant that could be used. For a long time the general theory has been that the No. 1 nitrate plant would be abandoned. I desire to call your attention to page 213 of the hearings on the first deficiency appropriation bill, to the testimony of Doctor Cottrell, the chief of the research laboratory, in which he says—and this is so important that I will take a moment to read it in full—he says:

Doctor COTTRELL. The whole point of our work, of course, is aimed at cheapening the production of the nitrogen portion of the fertilizer that the farmer uses.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the first understandable statement we have had. Now state the next phase of it.

Doctor COTTRELL. As to how we get at it?

The CHAIRMAN. You say your object is to make it cheaper. How do you make it cheaper?

Doctor COTTRELL. At the close of the war period the plants at Muscle Shoals were shut down. There were two plants, plant No. 1 and plant No. 2, plant No. 2 being the cyanamid plant and plant No. 1 being the so-called modified Haber process plant, or, more generally, the direct synthetic ammonia process. It was recognized from the beginning, or from the time those plants were put up, that there was no question but what we could make plant No. 2 operate and make cyanamid. That technique was pretty well known in this country, but it was also recognized that it was to be an obsolescent method as far as fertilizer was concerned.

Plant No. 2 did make cyanamid during the war, but plant No. 1 has never developed anything. Again I call attention to the fact that two years ago when your committee began these investigations the No. 1 plant process at Muscle Shoals was not successful. I continue from the testimony:

The CHAIRMAN. It was too expensive?

Doctor COTTRELL. Yes, sir; it had served its purpose in the development of the art. The Haber plant, or plant No. 1, was the one that we were taking the greatest gamble on being able to work, but the one that would go furthest toward the cutting of the costs if successful.

Here is the potent portion of this testimony, and this, I again remind you, was not before the Military Affairs Committee, but in the last few days before the Subcommittee on Appropriations in the hearings on the deficiency appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Neither of these processes is economical, is it?

Doctor COTTRELL. Yes, sir. At present we believe that we have the No. 1 process in such shape that it is economical.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the Haber process.

Doctor COTTRELL. Yes, sir; it appears to be economical. That process is the one that was employed on a large scale in Germany during the war, and it is the one by which Germany is now making a large supply of fertilizer, and by which she is cutting her costs down.

There is one more reason for realizing the enormous importance of the work of Muscle Shoals. We need it for the Haber process. I invite the attention of the membership of the House, especially to the first four pages of the minority report in reference to Muscle Shoals. There is in these four pages a comparative statement of what the minority members think will be accomplished under the Hull bill in comparison with what would be accomplished under the McKenzie bill. I hope the Members will carefully read the pages. They are as follows:

The Government has constructed works of tremendous value and importance at Muscle Shoals. They represent an investment of more than $135,000,000. This is the actual cost to the taxpayers of the United States.

Dam No. 2 and hydroelectric installation of 18 units will, when completed, be the largest dam in the world and represent an investment of more than $51,000,000.

Nitrate plant No. 1 represents an investment of more than $12,000,000. It includes 1,900 acres of land. In addition to nitrate plant No. 1 there are large permanent, substantial buildings for various smaller manufacturing purposes. Located on this tract are 125 permanent residences with all modern improvements; also 9 miles of macadam roads; also 8 miles of sewerage; also 4 miles of standard-gauge railroads, with necessary locomotives, cars, repair shops, etc. There are paved streets and water works.

Nitrate plant No. 2, including the Waco quarry, represents an investment of more than $67,000,000. It includes 2,300 acres of land.

On this tract are 186 permanent residences, many of them with two bathrooms, including expensive electric-lighting fixtures, water supply, sewers, etc. These great nitrate works include the largest buildings of their kind in the world. There are also a number of permanent buildings for various small manufacturing purposes, such as sawmills, blacksmith shops, etc.

On this tract comprising nitrate plant No. 2 there is a hotel which is completely furnished and equipped, containing more than 100 rooms. On this tract there are 24 miles of improved roads and cemented sidewalks and streets; there are on this tract about 40 miles of standard-gauge railroad tracks; there are 20 miles of sewers; there is also on this tract a complete waterworks and sewerage system; and there is attached to this nitrate plant No. 2 a steam plant for the generation of electricity, known as the Sheffield steam plant, which alone cost more than $12,000,000. This plant is in high-class running order to-day and is being used. There should be included in this picture the fact that there is $500,000 worth of platinum in storage at the United States subtreasury in New York belonging to the nitrate plants for use in a catalyst for extracting nitrogen from the air. There is also cash in the United States Treasury amounting to $3,472,487.25, recently received by the Government for the sale of the Gorgas steam plant, which it is proposed under the committee bill with the Madden amendment to immediately spend in behalf of Mr. Ford's offer for the construction of an auxiliary steam plant for his benefit.

In return for all the above, including the platinum valued at $500,000 and the $3,472,487.25 cash now in the United States Treasury, Mr. Ford proposes to pay to the United States Government $5,000,000, and that only in several annual installments.

In other words, Mr. Ford proposes to pay $5,000,000 for the following property:

Nitrate plant No. 2, costing	$66,252,392.21
Nitrate plant No. 1, costing	12,887,941.31
Waco quarry, costing	1,302,962.88
Cash from sale of Gorgas plant	3,472,487.25
Total	83,915,783.65

The Government, if it wants to part with the steam plant for the generation of electricity attached to nitrate plant No. 2, known as the Sheffield steam plant, is now offered by one of the bidders appearing before Congress in this matter the sum of $4,500,000 spot cash for this one unit alone.

Such are Mr. Ford's demands.

A group of power companies in the South has made to the War Department another offer. The contrast between Mr. Ford's offer and their offer is set forth in the following comparative statement:

COMPARISON OF PENDING BILLS.

HULL BILL (H. R. 6781), BASED ON NITRATE POWER COMPANIES' OFFER.	M'KENZIE BILL (H. R. 518), BASED ON FORD OFFER.
1. (a) $15,000,000 of capital (one company). Owned by Americans.	1. (b) $10,000,000 of capital (one company); personal liability of Ford limited to formation of corporation with above capital. Owned by Americans.
2. (a) United States deeds to company: Nothing.	2. (b) United States deeds to company property costing: Nitrate plant No. 1, $12,888,000; Nitrate plant No. 2, including 90,000 horsepower steam plant, 66,252,000; Waco quarry, 1,303,000; New 40,000 horsepower steam plant and transmission line to be erected by Government, 3,472,000; Total, 83,915,000
3. (a) United States leases for 50 years nitrate plant No. 1 and power plants under Federal water power act.	3. (b) In addition to deeding above properties, United States also leases for 100 years the water-power plants, disregarding Federal water power act.
4. (a) Agrees to make 50,000 tons annually of fixed nitrogen. To furnish 100,000 horsepower for fertilizer at cost and 40,000 additional as required. To maintain nitrate plant No. 2 at present nitrogen capacity of 40,000 tons. In case of war 90,000 tons of nitrogen available.	4. (b) Agrees to make 40,000 tons annually of fixed nitrogen. No promise as to amount or cost of power. To maintain nitrate plant No. 2 or its equivalent (estimated by Ordnance Department to cost not over $100,000 per annum, or $10,000,000 in 100 years). In case of war, 40,000 tons of nitrogen available.
5. (a) Forfeiture of lease on nitrate plant and water power plants if agreement violated. Government may take over in case of war; does not require Government to protect company against losses.	5. (b) No forfeiture of nitrate plants, steam plants, or quarry for violation of agreement; forfeiture under certain conditions of water-power lease. Government loses control and ownership of both nitrate plants, steam plants, and quarry, except may take over plant No. 2 in case of war on "protecting company from losses occasioned by such use, and shall return the said property in as good condition as when received and reasonably compensate company for the use thereof."
6. (a) Government has right to recapture all property leased at end of 50 years.	6. (b) No right of recapture as to nitrate plants, steam plants, and quarry. Ford has preferred right to renew water-power leases at end of 100 years.
7. (a) Federal water power act provides that no value shall be allowed for power leases in cases of recapture.	7. (b) In absence of express stipulation, courts would be required to value power leases in proceedings to take over power plants by Government if that should ever be desirable.
8. (a) Regulation by public authority as to rates, service, and security issues. Profits limited by public authority.	8. (b) No regulation of rates, service, or security issues. Profits not regulated, except as to fertilizer.
9. (a) Power in excess of that used in fertilizer available throughout Southeastern States.	9. (b) Power available only to Ford plants at Muscle Shoals.
10. (a) Offers cash payment of $4,500,000 for 90,000-horsepower steam plant at Muscle Shoals if Government desires to sell. Government retains title to balance of properties. Devotes at least $1,000,000 for research work.	10. (b) Offers $1,527,512.75 for both nitrate plants, steam plants, and quarry, costing Government over $80,000,000, and divests Government of title to same. No sum for research work.
11. (a) Agrees to pay toward headwater improvements as required by Federal water power act.	11. (b) Pays nothing for headwater improvements.
12. (a) Rental Dams Nos. 2 and 3 for 50 years, $138,084,400; total for 100 years, $295,624,400. Savings to Government for 50 years, $34,218,000. Savings to Government for 100 years, $75,660,000.	12. (b) Rental Dams Nos. 2 and 3 for 50 years, $103,866,654; total for 100 years, $219,964,954.

Some of our colleagues have favored acceptance of the Ford offer because they regarded this as the only feasible means for securing the development and utilization of Muscle Shoals. It will be remembered that a sharp controversy arose in the House of Representatives several years ago as to whether further money should be appropriated for the completion of the Wilson Dam. Upon this question the House sharply divided, and in the closing hours of the Sixty-sixth Congress an appropriation for that purpose was defeated by a vote in the House. To many persons the meaning of the vote seemed to be that the Government itself would go no further in making the development, and this was the situation when the Ford offer first appeared. It was apparently the only way to insure the completion of the dam and utilization of the works for the purpose for which they were originally intended. It seemed for the time being even that the great nitrate works at Muscle Shoals might otherwise be practically abandoned.

Support of the Ford offer under these circumstances bears no resemblance to the present problem before the House. Since that time Congress has voted many millions of dollars for the completion of the Wilson Dam and clearly indicated its purpose to complete the entire development there and retain the nitrate works and the vast power plants in such a manner as to be always available for national defense. It is now clear that to secure these great advantages and to carry out this enlightened policy no such sacrifice as would be involved in the acceptance of the Ford offer is necessary.

There are, therefore, before you for consideration two projects for the furtherance of an object with which you will all agree. One is the Ford offer as contained in the McKenzie bill, and the other is the united power and nitrate companies' offer as contained in the Hull bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman does not contend that that is going to be the legislative situation?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. In my opinion, that is the legislative situation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think it rather significant that the minority of the committee did not even recommend the adoption of any of the substitutes proposed?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I think that the gentleman will find that in their remarks on this subject every member who signed the minority report will and does advocate the passage of the Hull bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the minority report specifically says that the minority does not make any recommendation of the acceptance of any proposal.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I do not so understand the position of those making the minority report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me read from the minority report itself:

We do not recommend the acceptance of any of the proposals referred to.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I have already explained my position upon that to the gentleman, and the minority report speaks for itself.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is there a specific offer before Congress or the departments as covered by the Hull bill?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. There is.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman goes into long details in opposition to the Ford offer and specifically speaks in reference to the Ford offer, but I find nothing in the report showing that there is a specific and definite offer such as is covered by the Hull bill.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. There is a specific and definite offer.

Mr. TREADWAY. And they are responsible parties?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. They are responsible parties, and that will be shown fully when Mr. HULL, the author of the bill, explains his bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the offer?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. It is covered by the Hull bill and that phase of the matter will be taken care of by Mr. HULL.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman hesitate to inform the House?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Oh, no; the gentleman does not hesitate to inform the House and the gentleman from Alabama knows that he does not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then let us have it.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I have not remaining time enough to explain the Hull bill, and under the order of discussion which we have arranged Mr. HULL himself will explain his bill. I have said to the gentlemen that I favor the Hull bill and I have said that there is a definite proposition which is to be ratified by the Hull bill if the House so desires.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman tell us whether or not either one of the offers of these allied power companies from the Southeast, either of January 15, 1924, or January 24, 1924, contemplate the formation of one single corporation such as is mentioned in section 2 of the Hull bill?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I would say to the gentleman that it does absolutely, and if I can get additional time I shall be very glad to show that.

Mr. McSWAIN. I suggest to my friend before he answers that question in that way that he should read those offers.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. And I say I happen to have been present when the testimony was taken and I have read the offers. I invite the attention of my colleagues on the committee and other gentlemen who are interested in this question to page 127 of the hearings in the testimony of Mr. Yates. Mr. Yates appeared for the united power and nitrate companies. At that time he said:

Mr. YATES. The power company that makes the proposal on Muscle Shoals is a combined power company, owned by the power companies of the Southeast. That company will form a fertilizer company and will guarantee the carrying out of the contract.

NOTE: Since my first statement to the committee I have discussed the matter with others interested and am authorized to say that at the option of the Government we would be willing to form one corporation with a capital of $15,000,000 in cash to take the lease of nitrate plant No. 1 and of the water-power projects under the terms of our proposals, to be owned and controlled by Americans.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. And as a matter of fact the Alabama Power Co.'s offer, while he stated that in the last hearing, really was that they would organize one company for $10,000,000 to operate the power under that, and that they would organize a $5,000,000 corporation to operate the fertilizer and the nitrate plant, and they proposed to guarantee the faithful performance of the $5,000,000 corporation.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I say to my colleague that his interpretation is not mine.

I would like now to yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] if he is in the room, to whom I could not yield a few moments ago.

Mr. BLANTON. If I understand the gentleman's position, he is against the Henry Ford proposition.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I am.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the Muscle Shoals water-power proposition; the gentleman is against water projects?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I am against the Ford offer—I do not know that I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is against water.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Not for certain purposes. I am willing to let the gentleman from Texas have all he wants to. [Laughter.]

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I will.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will not the gentleman state to the House there was at least one member of the committee who was not in favor of the acceptance of any of these offers?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I will say to the House that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] was not in favor of any of the offers, but desired the Government to continue the operation of Muscle Shoals.

Now, gentlemen, there are certain general observations I would like to make before closing in reference to this matter.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Before the gentleman leaves that——

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand the gentleman is to place in his speech the comparisons referred to——

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I have already done that.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. That is a comparison of the Alabama Power Co.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I originally made that comparison myself.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Is not the comparison made by the gentleman identical with the comparison submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. Yates, of the Alabama Power Co.?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Not entirely. I suggested a comparison to the power company and I later amplified it for the minority report.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Are they different figures?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. The one suggested I drafted in pencil, and the final one is more full and complete.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I understand the gentleman suggested the comparison to the Alabama Power Co., and the power company had Mr. Yates——

Mr. HILL of Maryland. I drafted it myself in pencil and gave it to the power company.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And submitted it to the power company; is that it?

Mr. HILL of Maryland. Yes; I submitted it to the power company for verification.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And Mr. Yates, representative of the power company, submitted this comparison to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HILL of Maryland. He submitted the original. The comparison in the minority report is an amplification of the one I submitted for verification to the power company. I am in favor of the power companies' offer as authorized by the Hull bill, and I therefore made a comparison of the Ford offer and the power companies' offer. I was more familiar with the Ford offer than with the power companies' offer and therefore asked the latter to check my comparison and put it in the hearings.

I was against the Ford offer in the last Congress, even before the power companies came forward with a complete and workable offer for nitrates and fertilizer.

The Ford offer requires the Government to deed to Mr. Ford its nitrate plants and other properties, which cost the Government over $80,000,000, and to lease to Mr. Ford water-power plants having 850,000 horsepower. The water-power plants are to be constructed entirely at the expense of the Government and will cost in excess of $80,000,000 when completed, making the total value of Government property to be deeded or leased for 100 years to Mr. Ford over $160,000,000.

Aside from all else, the principal reason given for violating the existing water power act and other national policies, the proponents of this offer seem to favor it because of its so-called guaranty to manufacture fertilizer over a period of 100 years. There is no such guaranty. None was intended by Mr. Ford and there is none in the McKenzie bill. Even if there were a guaranty, there is no adequate means of enforcing a violation of the contract should it be made with Mr. Ford under the terms of the present offer.

Members of the Military Affairs Committee will, of course, recall certain hearings in 1922 in executive session. In the course of the hearings the only representative of Mr. Ford who ever appeared expressed his view as to just what was intended.

Section 14 of the McKenzie bill states that one of the principal considerations of the Ford offer is the manufacture, sale, and distribution of commercial fertilizers, and the Ford corporation "agrees that, continuously throughout the lease period, except as it may be prevented by reconstruction of the plant itself, or by war, strikes, accidents, fires, or other causes beyond its control, it will manufacture nitrogen and other commercial fertilizers, mixed or unmixed, and with or without filler, according to demand, at nitrate plant No. 2 or its equivalent, or at such other plant or plants adjacent or near thereto as it may construct, using the most economical source of power available."

This language was drafted by Mr. Ford's attorneys and was not the language desired by the Military Affairs Committee. But when it was presented to the committee as Mr. Ford's last word, Mr. Ford's representative took the position that the words, "according to demand," which appeared in this section for the first time in the history of the proposal, relieved Mr. Ford of any obligation to manufacture fertilizer unless a demand existed and that involves a demand at the cost of manufacture plus 8 per cent. Aside from many other expressions, the following is sufficient; it comes from the committee hearings on questions from Representative, now Senator, GREENE:

Mr. GREENE. This is all I suggest, with a due appreciation of your intention, whether that phrase, "according to market demands" does not have a dual interpretation?

Mr. MAYO. It may have, or it may not.

Mr. GREENE. It has that peculiar significance. It may mean "according to market demand" as to quantity irrespective of kind, or it may mean as to kind, irrespective of quantity. They are two irreconcilable things.

Mr. MAYO. I think it means both. (Page 94.)

Furthermore, the hearings show that the Ford Corporation need not make fertilizer if the board provided by the McKenzie bill decides that there is not sufficient demand for the fertilizer. Note the following answers of Mr. Mayo, Mr. Ford's representative:

Mr. HULL. I do not know that I have the correct idea of the change, but it seems to me as the committee had it there was no provision for ceasing the manufacture of the fertilizer provided the market was overstocked. As you have it, that is provided for by the use of the expression "market demand." Is that correct?

Mr. MAYO. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. That is really the big change you have made. We intended, as I understood it, that you should have a right, as Mr. QUIN has said, to change the position of the fertilizers. I do not know whether we had it there correctly, but we intended to give that right.

Mr. MAYO. We did not think you did. It tied us up.

Mr. HULL. You fixed it in your language so that you would surely have it?

Mr. MAYO. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. There was not any provision, as I understand, as we had it, for the cessation of the manufacture if the market would not absorb it. I am not in opposition to the proposition, but I want to get it fixed in my mind. It seems to me that is the real big change.

Mr. MAYO. We had always thought that nobody would expect us to make it and pile it up if there was no demand for it.

Mr. PARKER. What is that?

Mr. MAYO. Nobody could expect us to make fertilizer if there was no demand for it. We can not see that any such occasion should arise.

Mr. MILLER. I invite your attention to the phraseology on page 14 and ask you if that phraseology carries out your contention? This is the way it reads: "Operate nitrate plant No. 2 in the production of nitrogen and other commercial fertilizers, mixed or unmixed, according to market demands." That means market demands for mixed or unmixed fertilizer, not as to the quantity, does it not?

Mr. HULL. I am just trying to get Mr. Mayo's idea about this proposition.

Mr. MILLER. I am asking whether the aforesaid language does it.

Mr. MAYO. I think it would refer to both, would it not?

* * * * * * *

Mr. HULL. Is it your understanding that this board decides, or would have the right to decide, as to when the market demanded the manufacture of this fertilizer?

Mr. MAYO. I would think so.

Mr. HULL. That is your understanding?

Mr. MAYO. That is, if we could not dispose of the fertilizer and commenced to pile it up, I think the board would be our first relief. We have never thought that it was necessary to say so.

Mr. HULL. You would not expect the Government to depend upon your company to decide upon the market?

Mr. MAYO. No; that is why the board is provided for.

Mr. HULL. There should be some one who is going to decide that from a neutral standpoint.

Mr. MAYO. Exactly; that is why the board is there.

The committee also examined the Ford representative, because he had changed the words in the clause relating to release of the Ford corporation from manufacture from causes beyond its control (p. 102); the language suggested by the committee simply relieving from acts of Providence members of the committee at that time brought out that "it gives him [Ford] exemption if the market fails"—meaning exemption from the obligation to further manufacture fertilizer.

The following statements are worth serious consideration:

Mr. PARKER. I want to ask one question: You have changed the language "acts of Providence" to "causes beyond its control."

Mr. MAYO. Yes, sir.

Mr. PARKER. The language "acts of Providence" would not cover "causes beyond its control." Would not the language "causes beyond its control" cover inability to sell the product?

Mr. MAYO. No, sir; I do not think so.

Mr. PARKER. You do not think it would cover it?

Mr. MAYO. I do not think so.

Mr. PARKER. Then, why not stick to the language "acts of Providence," because that is perfectly plain?

Mr. MAYO. I think the language "causes beyond its control" is a better way around it.

Mr. PARKER. The trouble is that it is so broad that it covers a great many things. In my judgment, it would cover falling prices or a situation where you would not have a profitable market.

Therefore, there is no excuse for Congress to practically give away public properties—and that, too, for private use. The record of the hearings throughout contains statements apparently authorized by Mr. Ford that the entire power project would be used in his private business, except that which might be used in manufacturing fertilizer. He has always avoided any suggestion of placing the power under public control or regulation. According to the Government reports, there are in excess of 4,000,000 horsepower in the Southern States surrounding Muscle Shoals, of which 1,500,000 horsepower are developed, leaving 2,500,000 undeveloped, including the Muscle Shoals plants. To give Mr. Ford 850,000 horsepower, leaving a balance of 1,700,000 for all future time to serve the needs of that great section, in addition to giving Mr. Ford nitrate properties which cost the people over $80,000,000, will result in a greater national scandal than the Teapot Dome.

Even the deed which the Government is required to make conveying its properties must warrant the title. There is an outstanding contract with a concern known as the American Cyanamid Co., made in 1918, by which that company has a prior right to purchase the plant. The Attorney General held that the company's option was invalid, but notice was served on the committee that the company would contend for its rights. Mr. Ford's representative stated, however, that he was unwilling to accept the property and bear the burden of the lawsuit. (Hearings, p. 9.) Therefore, in addition to merely paying the Government a nominal amount of $1,500,000 for its nitrate plants, the Government must in addition litigate its right to convey the property with the Cyanamid Co. and pay whatever damages are awarded in addition.

Note the following extracts from the hearings in executive session on page 9:

The CHAIRMAN. The Air Nitrates Corporation also claim some rights in nitrate plant No. 2. Do you make any proposition respecting them?

Mr. MAYO. No, sir.

Mr. PARKER. You do not assume litigation there?

Mr. MAYO. No, sir.

Mr. PARKER. Nor in connection with plant No. 1, either?

Mr. MAYO. No, sir; we concluded that there will be none.

Mr. PARKER. Do I understand you correctly, gentlemen, that you say that Mr. Ford's company will not assume the liabilities of the United States on the contracts for plants Nos. 1 and 2 for the expenses and litigation thereunder, or guarantee the United States from loss by reason thereof?

Mr. MAYO. No, sir.

The Ford offer contains no right whatever in the Government to recover the nitrate properties in case there should be a violation of the contract by the Ford company. There is no adequate provision for recovering the water-power properties, and there is no liability whatever on Mr. Ford individually, and none beyond the $10,000,000 to be given the company when it is organized.

If anybody but Mr. Ford made this offer he would be jeered out of committee. I agree that Mr. Ford is an extraordinary man, but it is a Ford corporation and not Mr. Ford personally who will take over this great project if you pass the McKenzie bill.

Mr. Ford is 61 years old. He does not personally guarantee the performance of the proposed company, although many people think he does.

All Mr. Ford does is to get the company started. Here is the section of the McKenzie bill which covers that matter:

SEC. 23. All of the contracts, leases, deeds, transfers, and conveyances necessary to effectuate the acceptance of said offer shall be binding upon the United States, and jointly and severally upon Henry Ford, his heirs, representatives, and assigns, and the company to be incorporated by him, its successors and assigns.

I am looking to the Ford company 25 or 50 years hence, when Mr. Ford is gone. I can not agree to the Ford scheme.

Our recent colleague in this House, Senator GREENE, well summed up the truth as to the Ford offer in the hearings, as follows:

Mr. GREENE. Put it this way: You want us to capitalize Mr. Ford's good intentions and call that a Government asset in lieu of money?

Mr. MAYO. Yes, sir; you will have to do that to some extent.

Mr. GREENE. Do you believe that we were sent here and put under oath to do that sort of thing by citizens?

Mr. MAYO. I think you were sent here to do what, in your judgment, is best for the Government of the United States.

Mr. GREENE. But where would we end if we began capitalizing the good intentions of citizens and placing good property at their disposal, turning over to the Treasury account their good intentions as so much cash?

Mr. MAYO. If you put it on a strictly dollars and cents basis, you might scrap the whole thing for $7,000,000 or $8,000,000.

Mr. GREENE. We are confronted with similar propositions from time to time, and the theory and principle would remain the same if we once invoked such a principle. Some time ago we very carefully and deliberately eliminated from our official agencies and interests all that were sustained by private capital, as, for instance, the Rockefeller Foundation, because the Government could not afford as a matter of principle to be in partnership with private interests. If we once began, even with the most salutary proposition and with the utmost good intentions, the Lord only knows where cheap politics might sometimes land us.

Mr. MAYO. That is very true. All that I can say is that Mr. Ford has made the best bid that he can afford to make. That is all we have to offer, and that is where we stand.

As Mr. Mayo says, Mr. Ford "has made the best bid that he can afford to make." In my opinion he has not made an offer that we as agents and trustees for the American people can afford to accept.

I am against the Ford offer as set forth in the McKenzie bill, whether you accept the Hull bill substitute or not. If Mr. Ford will come up to the terms of the Hull bill, I should be glad to vote that he get Muscle Shoals on those terms, but I can not vote for the plan of absolute deed of certain Government property, leasing for 100 years of other property yet to be financed, and the other terms of the Ford offer. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON]. [Applause.]

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, while Muscle Shoals is located in north Alabama on the Tennessee River, in the district which I have the honor to represent, it is at the same time a great national development, and if Congress disposes of Muscle Shoals in the manner provided for in the McKenzie bill Muscle Shoals development will inure to the benefit of every class of people in every section of this country.

The passage of this bill providing for the acceptance of the offer of Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals carries out the provisions of Congress in authorizing the development at Muscle Shoals by the Government. That is, it provides that the nitrate plant be preserved in an up-to-date running condition, available to the Government for war purposes in the event of a military emergency, and for continuous operation of the plant in peace times for the manufacture of fertilizer at its maximum capacity. The passage of this bill also carries out to the letter the recommendations of President Coolidge on this subject in his recent message to the Congress when he said:

While the price for which it is sold is an important element, still there is another consideration even more compelling; that is, a cheaper and better fertilizer for the farmers, and if this object is accomplished the amount of money received for the property is not a primary or major consideration.

Much is being said these days about doing something for the farmers. You have an opportunity now to do something worth while for them. The farmers of the entire country, as shown by their indorsements through their organizations, are in favor of the Ford offer for Muscle Shoals. They are intelligent and know what it means. They know they have been paying two prices for a very inferior grade of fertilizer. Their representatives have gone to Muscle Shoals and made careful and thorough investigations and studies of this question, ascertained first-hand information what it would mean to agriculture, and have without a dissenting voice recommended and are now urging the acceptance of the Ford offer.

Much misinformation has been broadcasted about the obligation of Mr. Ford to make fertilizer. I call your attention to the offer as set out in this bill. In section 14 the Ford Co. will be required to manufacture nitrogen and other commercial fertilizers mixed or unmixed and with or without filler, according to demand, the annual production of which shall have a nitrogen content of at least 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen, which is the present annual capacity of plant No. 2. This would be sufficient to furnish nitrogen for 2,000,000 tons of 2–8–2 commercial fertilizer annually, and is equivalent to 250,000 tons of Chilean nitrate. The Ford Co. will be bound to manufacture this much fertilizer whether it is profitable or unprofitable, and it can not be sold at a price greater than 8 per cent on the actual cost of production. A board of representatives of the farm organizations, approved by the President and confirmed by the Senate, will have access to the books of the Ford Co. with power to regulate the price and see that not more than 8 per cent on the actual cost of production is charged, and also to provide for an equitable distribution of the fertilizer in the various parts of the country.

The most important question is, Will the farmer get his fertilizer cheaper if this bill passes? Both those favoring and opposing the Ford offer agree that Mr. Ford can make fertilizer at Muscle Shoals at about one-half the present price. If this be true the passage of this bill means a saving of $175,000,000 annually to the farmers of this country, as they ordinarily spend $350,000,000 annually for fertilizer. With cheap water power at Muscle Shoals, taking the nitrogen from the atmosphere instead of Chilean mines, with phosphate rock and all other raw materials in close proximity and in inexhaustible quantities, it is not difficult to understand how Mr. Ford can succeed in making fertilizer at one-half the present price.

But some may say that it can not be done. So did some claim that he could not operate a railroad any more successfully than the ordinary railroad companies. However, to show how this great Detroit manufacturer turns failure into success, here is what took place with that supposed to be old, worn-out railroad he took over a few years ago; preliminary statistics made public indicate that the Detroit, Toledo, & Ironton Railroad had a net operating income for 1923 of $1,786,924, compared with a deficit of $2,121,524, justifying the prediction made by Henry Ford when he bought the road July 10, 1920, that though previously operated with a deficit, it could be made a net earner in 1923. The gross income increased from $4,481,036 in 1920 to $10,417,412 in 1923, which was $1,412,938 greater than in 1922. Operating cost was reduced $737,170 over the previous year and the cost of maintenance of equipment dropped $691,243 and at the same time he reduced the rates and increased the wages of the railroad employees. The railroad, which Mr. Ford purchased for about $5,000,000 has about 400 miles of main line and 166 miles of yards and sidings with trackage rights over an additional 50 miles.

In the face of all of Ford's achievements you will occasionally hear some one who has not made a howling success of anything proclaiming from the housetop that Mr. Ford can not do at Muscle Shoals what he obligates himself to do. Let us give him a chance; that is the only way to find out. The Government has a great big white elephant on its hands. It has been standing there for five years since the war ended, costing millions of dollars maintenance charges, and at the same time rusting out and deteriorating in value. No one after all these years of waiting has made an offer to compare with that of Henry Ford. No one else with the cash to take Muscle Shoals and develop it has offered to take it and do in a way and manner fair to the Government and taxpayers what Ford has, and to utilize it for national-defense purposes and agriculture, as Congress intended when the development was authorized.

Henry Ford is one rich man who made his fortune by selling the products of his factories cheaper than any other manufacturer and at the same time paying his labor more wages than anyone else. Instead of putting his surplus millions of cash in tax-exempt securities, he asks Congress to give him an opportunity to invest in the production of the necessities of life for the American people at a fair price and give employment to a million people at good wages. [Applause.]

If this bill becomes a law, he will not only reduce the price of the farmer's fertilizer one-half but says he will be able to sell to the farmer a truck, a tractor, and an automobile all for $1,000 or less. [Applause.]

He is now selling the fertilizer which he produces as a by-product of his coke ovens at $19 per ton less than the market price.

I appeal to my colleagues from every section of our country to protect the South from the water-power monopoly. The Water Power Trust owns and controls practically all of the water-power sites in the South and the Southeastern States except Muscle Shoals, and they are here, and have been for a long time, with their paid lobby trying to get their greedy and monopolistic clutches on Muscle Shoals. [Applause.]

I appeal to you to keep this great nitrogen plant, a most important part of our national defense, in the hands of and under the control of Americans and American capital, as is expressly provided in this bill, and not allow it to get into the hands of nor under the control of the Alabama Power Co., whose securities to the extent of at least 35 to 45 per cent are owned and controlled by foreigners, and was so admitted by its president before the Military Committee of the House at the last session of Congress. Henry Ford is an American and the money which he proposes to use and spend in the development and operation at Muscle Shoals is also American. The terms of this bill forbid this development from ever getting into the possession or under the control of foreigners or foreign capital. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Does not the gentleman recognize that only a comparatively trivial part of the power developed there, 800,000 or 900,000 horsepower, is to be devoted to the manufacture of fertilizer, and that the balance, 790,000 horsepower, can be used by Mr. Ford for any other purpose besides the manufacture of fertilizer?

Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] used all his time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. When these two dams are built 121,000 primary horsepower will be developed; that is, power for 12 months continuously. The Government has one steam plant at Muscle Shoals of 80,000 horsepower. This bill provides for another steam plant on the Warrior River of 40,000 horsepower to take the place of the Goras plant, which was included in the Ford offer and was afterwards sold to the Alabama Power Co., making a total of 241,000 horsepower, and this is all of the primary water power and steam power Ford gets when his offer is accepted, and all he will have until he builds storage dams at his own expense on the upper Tennessee and its tributaries. It will require 100,000 primary horsepower to make the 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen with the process now in use at plant No. 2, and it requires 160,000 horsepower to produce the amount of phosphoric acid that would be required to make a complete fertilizer containing 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen, the amount Mr. Ford is required to produce annually; so Mr. Ford will have to use 240,000 horsepower to make fertilizer according to his obligation, and that consumes all of the primary power that he will get from the Government, both water and steam power.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Is the gentleman willing that an amendment shall be placed in this bill to the effect that all the power that is developed there shall be used for the manufacture of fertilizer?

Mr. ALMON. No, sir; I am not, and I wish I had time now to give my reasons why it should not be done. When I have the opportunity I will try to convince this House that an amendment of that kind ought not to be made, and I think when the House understands it it is not going to make it. [Applause.]

CHILEAN NITRATE AND FERTILIZER TRUSTS AND OTHER SELFISH INTERESTS OPPOSE THE FORD OFFER.

We now depend upon Chilean nitrate for nitrogen for fertilizer purposes. We have paid for Chilean nitrate since 1867 the enormous sum of $651,552,049 for 16,902,532 long tons of Chilean nitrate at the Chilean port, not including freight, commissions, or duty, upon which we have paid the Chilean Government $12.53 per long ton as an export duty, amounting to $209,107,989. This export tax or duty amounted to $10,809,337 in the year 1923.

Why should the farmers of the United States continue to pay tribute to a foreign country to secure nitrogen for fertilizer purposes when, by the acceptance of the Ford offer for Muscle Shoals, it can be purchased by them at one-half the price heretofore paid? Germany, by the construction and operation of air nitrogen plants, has freed herself from her dependency upon Chile for nitrates. We should cease to boast so much of our country and its greatness if we do not do the same. The acceptance of the Ford offer will not only make us independent of Chilean nitrate but will break the fertilizer combination and reduce the price one-half. This accounts for the opposition of the National Fertilizer Association, which has at times flooded the offices of the Members of Congress with literature in opposition to the Ford offer. The Chilean producers are reported to have made the claim that if compelled to do so by Muscle Shoals competition they will reduce their prices to one-half or even one-third of their present levels. If the establishment of the nitrogen industry at Muscle Shoals, under the Ford offer, merely results in eliminating the export duty collected by Chile for the privilege of purchasing nitrates in that country, it would have paid a dividend to American farmers and consumers of more than 5½ per cent on a valuation of $2,000,000,000.

INDORSEMENTS OF THE FORD OFFER.

The offer of Henry Ford is indorsed by the American Farm Bureau Federation, with 2,000,000 members; the National Grange; the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, commonly called the Farmers' Union; the American Federation of Labor; the Mississippi Valley Association, an organization of business men with a membership covering 27 States; the American Legion; and many States and counties, not only in the South but in the North and the West.

ONE-HUNDRED-YEAR LEASE PERIOD.

The only argument for a 50-year lease period is that at the end of that time the United States might secure more rental for this water-power right than is now possible. There is nothing in the history of electric-power business to indicate that water-power rights will be more valuable 50 years hence than they are to-day. On the contrary, the proposed superpower plans, the recent improvements in steam power, and the wide field of improvement suggested by substituting other vapors than steam for power purposes, as seen in the new mercury boilers, all indicate that in the future, as always in the past, the tendency will be toward cheaper power, which means less and not greater value for undeveloped power rights. This being true, the longer the lease period of a contract as advantageous to the Government and to the consumer as the Ford offer, the better the public interest is served. It has been shown that by far the greatest item entering into the cost of hydroelectric power under present methods of financing is the interest on the investment. This can be greatly reduced through the operation of a long-time sinking fund to retire the capital invested. Such a retirement fund can be set up over a 100-year period for about one-seventh of the annuity required for a 50-year period.

The water-power development at Muscle Shoals is in a class by itself. It was authorized by section 124 of the national defense act for two fundamental purposes, national defense and agriculture, and was commenced February 25, 1918, by direction of the President of the United States. The Federal power act was passed June 10, 1920, more than two years afterwards. This act was drawn to cover water-power developments made to provide power for ordinary manufacturing and public-utility purposes. Such plants carry no obligation for the manufacture of nitrogen or fertilizer, or for the maintenance of Government war plants. So Muscle Shoals is in an entirely different class.

It can not be claimed that Mr. Ford is not regulated. The first regulation is that his principle and chief product is fertilizer, upon which the price is regulated at not more than 8 per cent of the actual annual cost of production. Second, he is regulated in his obligation to maintain the plant suited to make war material in an up-to-date condition. No one can estimate what that will cost, and it must be a very large amount; it will necessarily be a very great amount. Besides, the price of whatever power he sells to the public will be fixed and regulated by the Public Utilities Commission.

Even if the power act were free from objectionable features, such as severance damages, it would not be fair to Mr. Ford to require him to assume these obligations for national defense and fertilizer purposes and meet the limitation of ordinary water-power projects at the same time. General Beach, Chief of Engineers, War Department, testified before the committee reporting this bill that 100 years in this case was proper and reasonable. He testified that it required 20 years' time to secure a market for the 750,000 horsepower developed at Niagara Falls, with Buffalo, Rochester, and the cities along the Great Lakes, and that it would require a longer time at Muscle Shoals for it is not a thickly settled country and not yet given over to manufactures. At Niagara Falls there is only 20 per cent variation in the flow of the water, and that is caused by the wind on the lakes; while at Muscle Shoals there is such a very large amount of secondary power that it will necessarily require more time to provide a market for the power than at a place like Niagara.

There is no limit on the permit of the water-power company at Keokuk, Iowa. The permit of the Alabama Power Co. at Lock No. 12 on the Coosa River in Alabama is indefinite. On the Little Tennessee River the American Aluminum Co. has developed 7,500 horsepower and has a perpetual right. The same water runs into the Tennessee River, and at Hales Bar on this river, 27 miles below Chattanooga, it becomes 99-year water, and when it gets 100 miles farther down to Muscle Shoals it is suggested by those opposing the Ford offer that it is a 50-year water. If there was any water power farther down toward the Ohio River I suppose it would go to the vanishing point. [Applause.] Muscle Shoals has been developed primarily for two purposes, viz, national defense and agriculture; and the Congress of the United States should keep its hands on it, as is provided in this bill, and not allow it to get into the hands of or under the control of the Federal Power Commission or in any other bureau or department of the Government. It has no place with the Federal Power Commission. [Applause.]

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

We all now believe in preparedness. We have not forgotten our recent experience. No nation of any standing will ever again depend upon a foreign market for a supply of nitrogen for munition purposes. Without her nitrogen plants Germany could not have prosecuted the war after importations from Chile were stopped. If our importation of Chilean nitrates had been cut off by the Germans during the war, as was seriously threatened at one time, and the war had continued, we would have been helpless if it had not been for the Muscle Shoals plant, which was finished just as the war ended.

The fixation of atmospheric nitrogen is a comparatively new art and will be improved on from time to time, and if that plant is allowed to remain in a stand-by condition it will not only cost millions of dollars but will rust out and become obsolete and of no value in the event of a military emergency. The only way to preserve it for national-defense purposes is to operate it in the manufacture of fertilizer in peace times and keep it up to date and in running order, as will be done if Ford's offer is accepted.

FINANCIAL OBLIGATION OF MR. FORD.

In order for Mr. Ford to put the plant in operation will require an expenditure on his part of at least $59,000,000, as shown in the hearings before the committee. Now, let us see what additional financial obligation Mr. Ford assumes. He agrees to pay 4 per cent on the entire cost of water-power development, including flowage damage and installation of electric-power equipment and locks and canal for navigation purposes, except about $16,000,000, which was spent by the Government on Dam No. 2 during and just after the war and before Mr. Ford made his offer. It is claimed by some that he should pay interest on this amount. He is not willing to do it and should not be expected to do so. This work was done under war conditions and cost double what it would in normal times. As an evidence of this, it was estimated that nitrate plant No. 2, when it was commenced, would be built for $30,000,000, and it cost $67,000,000. The plans for the construction of nitrate plant No. 1 was estimated at a cost of $3,000,000 and cost $13,000,000. This was due to war conditions and the prices paid both for labor and materials. So it is reasonable to assume that $8,000,000 would be a fair value for the work done on the Wilson Dam before Mr. Ford made his offer. General Beach, Chief of Engineers, testified before the committee that $8,575,000 of the cost of construction of Dams Nos. 2 and 3 should be charged to navigation. So Mr. Ford is undertaking to pay full 4 per cent on the entire cost of the construction of the dams, less what should properly be charged to navigation. Mr. Ford and his company agree to provide for an amortization sinking fund, which, if invested at 4 per cent, will return to the Government $49,071,935 at the end of the lease period. This is about the cost of the water-power development. If invested at 4½ per cent, it will return to the Government $70,100,000. So the Ford company not only pays 4 per cent interest on the cost of the water-power development but liquidates the cost itself. He is to pay $5,000,000 for the nitrate plants and rock quarry. This is more by far than has been realized on any other war plant.

In the sale of other war plants the Government made outright sales. In this case the Government reserves very valuable interest for national defense purposes. Mr. Ford is also required to furnish free of cost power to operate the locks and is to pay $55,000 annually in installments, quarterly in advance, for repairs, maintenance, and operation of Dams Nos. 2 and 3, and their gates and locks, and also maintain at his own expense in efficient operating condition the powerhouses and all appurtenances.

THE AMOUNT AND USE OF THE MUSCLE SHOALS POWER.

Dams No. 2 and 3 at Muscle Shoals only develop 121,000 primary horsepower, the steam plant at No. 2 with 80,000 horsepower, and the steam plant to be built at Gorgas with 40,000 horsepower, making a total primary power of 241,000 horsepower.

One hundred thousand horsepower will be required to operate plant No. 2 with the present process to make 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen, and 160,000 horsepower will be required to produce the amount of phosphoric acid as would be required in making a complete fertilizer containing the 40,000 tons of fixed nitrogen.

Whatever additional primary power developed by storage dams on the upper Tennessee River and its tributaries will be paid for by Mr. Ford.

It is claimed by some that Mr. Ford should have incorporated in his offer an agreement to sell and distribute to the public the surplus power. When Mr. Ford assumes obligations calling for many millions of dollars in connection with this development, including the building of storage dams at his own expense, it should be left to him to determine the disposition of the surplus power, and in doing so he would of course be controlled by the public service commission.

Mr. Ford said in a carefully prepared statement on October 11, 1923, thaf if he got Muscle Shoals he would distribute power 200 miles in every direction. With this understanding the people in the territory affected and all their Representatives in Congress are enthusiastically supporting the Ford offer as made and set out in this bill. Mr. Ford's statement that he would sell and distribute the surplus power constitutes a moral obligation that he and his company could not ignore without very serious injury to the standing and business interest of the Ford company which would operate Muscle Shoals, as well as the Ford Motor Co., of Detroit. [Applause.]

OTHER OFFERS.

No other offer made for Muscle Shoals in any way compares with the Ford offer in advantages to the Government and the people. The Ford offer has been reported by the Military Committee of the House both at this and the last session of Congress, and at the same time that committee failed and refused to recommend any other offer. The members who filed a minority report criticize the Ford offer, but do not favor any other offer. I have not the time nor do I deem it necessary to discuss the other offers, for they are not before the House, but will if necessary when this bill is being considered under the five-minute rule.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE SHOULD CARRY WEIGHT WITH THE HOUSE.

The Military Committee has been conducting hearings and has had various offers for Muscle Shoals under consideration for more than two years. They have been earnest and faithful in the discharge of this important duty. Hence the report and recommendations should have great weight with the House.

BILL SHOULD NOT BE AMENDED.

The ordinary practice of amending bills does not apply to this measure. This bill sets out an offer made by Henry Ford for Muscle Shoals and should be voted up or down. It will be taken for granted that all who favor the Ford offer will support the bill as reported by the committee. It is but natural that those who oppose it would like to see such material amendments made as would destroy it. So I appeal to all of you who want to do something worth while at this time to help the farmers, and in doing this help all the people to carry out the wishes of the great majority of the American people, to vote for the Ford offer. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for one minute.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, if the record in this case would bear out the statements of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON], I would be for the Ford offer. But there is not one syllable of testimony in the record that substantiates one claim that the gentleman from Alabama has made.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. No; I regret I can not yield. He says that if Mr. Ford gets Muscle Shoals it is going to benefit in the way of power and light every section in the United States. Mr. Ford says if you give him Muscle Shoals he is going to use a part of the energy in making fertilizer and the rest of it he is going to use in a manufacturing plant for himself, to make, he says, automobiles and parts of automobiles and, he says, anything else that will bring him in a greater revenue. That is the case, and the gentleman from Alabama knows it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL], reserving time to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for one minute.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that I am for this resolution and for the Ford bill. [Applause.]

The power companies' proposition, supported by the minority report, is unreal, intangible, and has been thrown together only as a subterfuge with which to attempt the destruction of the Ford plan. After the majority report of the committee on this bill had been submitted it comes in at the last minute through a resolution of a Member of Congress and offers to organize a corporation of $15,000,000 to do the work which Ford has for the last three years been offering to do. The corporation is not yet an identity; it is simply a myth around which the opponents of the Ford offer hope to gather in an attempt to relay enough votes to defeat an honest-to-God proposal.

The allied water power companies of the country are the proponents of this measure, and are united in their fight against Ford in his attempt to produce a cheap commercial fertilizer. They realize that once this great water power comes into his hand under the bill provided here their control of the nitrate market is gone glimmering.

The power company pretends to do that which Ford has been offering to do, but the distinct difference between their offer and the Ford offer is that there is nothing but wind back of this proposition which is to create a corporation of $15,000,000, the $15,000,000 to be gathered from stockholders not herein named, which means, in its last analysis, only a something on which to hold until the real danger to them is destroyed; that is, only to delay and keep from maturing the Ford plan until the complexion of Congress is so changed that there will no longer be danger of its passage.

Had not this Ford plan been before Congress for the last three years, this plant would have been sold as other war plants have been sold, for a twentieth of their cost, aye, and for less; as our ships that averaged us $800,000 apiece are today being sold for $5,000. Estimates of its actual value have run from five to nine million dollars. Ford offers $5,000,000 in spot cash and a semiannual payment of enough money so that in 100 years amortization at 4 per cent interest, it will give back to the Government every cent invested, which is approximately $80,000,000. This, together with the maintenance of the plant and the dams and locks and a guaranty to produce fertilizer at not to exceed 8 per cent above actual cost, which will cut the fertilizer bill to the farmers in this country right in two.

The power plan, so called, is only a straw bill, and it should affect the vitality of the Ford proposition no more than a leaden bullet would affect the vitality of a ghost. [Applause.]

While Ford's corporation is going to take this over at not less than $10,000,000, he will immediately furnish the money, and it is something real with which we are dealing. The locks and the whole plant will be under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army.

It is very fitting that Ford should be the man through whose offer we should again revitalize the fast depleting soil of this country, since it was through his great business ability that there came about the universal use of gasoline power in field, on road, and in the city. To-day from one end of the country to the other scarcely a horse, a mule, or an ox can be seen, while a few years ago the roads and lanes were swarming and the fields and pastures were full of them. To-day the automobile, the truck, the tractor have taken their place and they are extinct. Not only no longer can the farmer rely upon the fertilizer returned through this power but, on the other hand, a great demand has ceased for the produce of the farm which went to feed them.

We have but to go back through the annals of history to find upon what rests the stability of the country. India, China, Persia, Italy, and Spain were once prosperous. To-day, because of the depletion of the soil, they exist in frugal parsimony.

Washington was anxious about the exhaustion of our soil, and Lincoln, even in the days when the virgin prairies teemed with fertility, looking ahead with concerned vision, emphasized the importance of renewing soil fertility.

Look at the vast number of abandoned New England farms, the ever-increasing acreage of abandoned farms all over the country, abandoned for lack of nothing but fertilizer. All they want is cheap fertilizer. We can not go very far in soil rehabilitation with 1,000 per cent profit on it as we have it under the Fertilizer Trust.

In many communities, up in the country, in my congressional district, I know where they are using good hay for fertilizer, hay that would bring money in the market. In California, I understand, in the Imperial Valley, they are using alfalfa that could be sold for $25 a ton for fertilizing their fruit trees. This sort of fertilizer is inferior to nitrate.

At Muscle Shoals is the inexhaustible power and the sulphurous rocks from which can be taken the necessary ingredients with which to make cheap fertilizer.

In time of war provision is made in the bill that it must immediately be turned over to the United States with such man power as we desire. It is of first importance for our national defense that we be self-sustaining in supply of nitrates for explosives.

The bill provides that no one can own any stock in this corporation except an American citizen.

The great problem that is staring us in the face to-day is legislation looking to the preservation of the farmer and the lightening of his crushing burden. Even before the war the average farm return on investment was not to exceed 3 per cent. To-day in my State, the most fertile land in the world, there is a constant stream cityward from the discouraged, disheartened, and bankrupt farmer. Profits of years of arduous toil wiped out, nothing facing them but deficits and mortgages, they give up the bootless struggle. It is to Congress that those sturdy farmers remaining are looking for a sign of some legislation that will tend to equalize and protect them, as are the other industries of the country under our laws.

The farmers of the country want this bill. They want it because they need cheap fertilizer. I am for the Ford proposition.

Upon the fertilization of the soil rests the profit of the farm; upon the condition of the farm rests the prosperity and well-being of the farmer; and upon the prosperity of the farm rests the safety, the stability, and prosperity of the Nation.

You can burn down your cities and your manufactories, destroy your banks and industries, but if the farms are fertile, if the farms are left intact, the cities will spring up again like magic, while if you destroy the fertility of the farm your cities will rot and grass grow in their street. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. Before that question is presented I presume the gentleman from the Committee on Military Affairs will wish to make some disposition of the time or some selection as to those who shall apportion the time.

The SPEAKER. That will come when the House goes into Committee of the Whole.

The gentleman from Ohio move the previous question on the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 518) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to sell to Henry Ford nitrate plant No. 1, at Sheffield, Ala.; nitrate plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Waco Quarry, near Russellville, Ala.; and to lease to the corportaion to be incorporated by him Dam No. 2 and Dam No. 3 (as designated in H. Doc. 1262, 64th Cong., 1st sess.), including power stations when constructed as provided herein, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 518.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Pending that motion, will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. To suggest that to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and I am informed by the chairman of the committee which has the call that he has some important bills to bring up. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks it is quite essential that the debate on this bill should proceed and continue until the bill is disposed of or whether it could be passed over until Thursday?

Mr. McKENZIE. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I simply wish to say that I think we all consider this one of the most important propositions that will be before Congress at this session. The debate will be a debate which the Members of the House ought to listen to continuously in order that they may be able to make up their minds from the facts submitted; and that being true—while I have no desire to interfere with Calendar Wednesday—I feel that in justice to the committee and the country on this proposition it would be a wise thing to continue the consideration of this bill until it is completed and then take the next day for Calendar Wednesday business. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman whether he thinks he would be safe in saying that this bill will be completed by Thursday evening?

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why it should take longer than Thursday evening to complete the consideration of this bill, in view of the fact that this is a proposal for a contract, and being such it ought not to be amended. There will be some discussion, of course, under the five-minute rule, but it is a proposition that should not be amended. Therefore, I can not see how we could use up very much time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me make this suggestion by way of unanimous consent and subject to the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW]. I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Wednesday be made in order on Friday next, provided the Muscle Shoals bill shall have been finished by that time, otherwise that it shall be in order on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Wednesday shall be in order on Friday next, provided the Muscle Shoals bill is completed by that time, and if not it shall be in order on Saturday.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he would be willing to change his suggestion so as to make the business of the committee now having the right to Calendar Wednesday in order on the first day following the conclusion of this bill, no matter what day it is.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I would be perfectly willing to do that.

Mr. WINSLOW. In that case, I think we would be disposed to yield, although I do not think the committees ought to be staved off indefinitely for their own sake and for the sake of the business of the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday be postponed until the day after the completion of the Muscle Shoals bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the interruption of Calendar Wednesday has an injurious effect on the transaction of business, and there is very much business accumulating from committees on the calendar, so that we ought not to be selecting certain bills and giving them right of way over this rule of the House, and I must enter my objection to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 518.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MAPES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 518, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 518) to authorize and direct the Secretary of War to sell to Henry Ford nitrate plant No. 1, at Sheffield, Ala.; nitrate plant No. 2, at Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Waco Quarry, near Russellville, Ala.; and to lease to the corporation to be incorporated by him Dam No. 2 and Dam No. 3 (as designated in House Document 1262, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session), including power stations when constructed as provided herein, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I want to have it distinctly understood about the time. One-half of the time in favor of the bill will be under my control and one-half of that time under the control of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], and the control of one-half of the time of those opposed to the bill, of course, will be in charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that can not be made in committee. That is an agreement that can be made only in the House. I make the point of order. That can be arranged, however.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that one half of the time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] and the other half by some member of the Committee on Military Affairs opposed to the bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. MORIN.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee, I think, would have the right to designate the member of the Military Affairs Committee opposed to the bill who should control the time in opposition.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] will control the time of those in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that satisfactory to the other members of the Committee on Military Affairs? If there is no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] will control the five hours in opposition to the bill.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is recognized.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. McKENZIE was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House. I am sure that I express the feelings of all the members of the Committee on Military Affairs when I state that we regret very much that we can not have with us in the active consideration of this important matter the distinguished chairman of the committee, Hon. JULIUS KAHN, whose absence is due to ill health.

Mr. Chairman and colleagues, in undertaking to present this very important subject to the House I realize my limitations, and since I appreciate that every Member is interested, I am convinced that it will be much better for me to make a connected explanation of this subject without interruption. Therefore I respectfully request my colleagues not to interrupt with questions until I have concluded my general statement, after which I will be glad to answer any question so far as I am able.

Inasmuch as there are many Members present who were not in the Sixty-seventh Congress, and perhaps many of whom have not had an opportunity to study this particular subject in all of its bearings, I am going to take a chance on being tedious to some of my older colleagues by reviewing briefly the history of the Federal Government's activities in connection with Muscle Shoals and the Tennessee River.

THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

Picture, if you please, the Tennessee River, formed by confluence of the French Broad River, which has its source in western North Carolina, and the Holston River, which has its source in Virginia. These two streams unite just above the city of Knoxville in east Tennessee, and from that point, following southwesterly along the valleys of the Southern Appalachian Mountains, the Tennessee crosses the State of that name, then turning westerly it crosses northern Alabama, touching for a few miles the northeastern corner of Mississippi, and turning abruptly northward it recrosses Tennessee and traverses Kentucky to the Ohio, into which it flows at Paducah. The distance from the head of the river just above Knoxville to Paducah is 652 miles.

Through central Tennessee there is a limestone plateau which extends for a short distance into Alabama, and then suddenly terminates and the long flat area of the Gulf coastal plain begins. The edge of this central plateau can be traced from the city of Washington on down through Virginia and the Carolinas, around through the northern part of Georgia into Alabama, and where the streams cross the edge of this plateau and drop to the coastal plain is the well known "fall line" on which the chief water powers of the southern Appalachian territory are located.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS.

Where the Tennessee River crosses this prominent geological formation is a shallow stretch 37 miles long which has been known for more than 100 years as the Muscle Shoals. These rapids have been the greatest barrier to continuous navigation of this great inland stream, and their improvement has been the object of State and Federal effort for a century. On the 7th of next December it will be just 100 years since President James Monroe, in his annual message to Congress, presented the annual report of Secretary of War John C. Calhoun, who named the Muscle Shoals improvement as one of the three projects which were of greatest national importance at that time and recommended that an engineering study be made.

As a result of these recommendations a preliminary examination was ordered on March 12, 1827, and in the report, dated May 14, 1828 (H. Doc. No. 284, 20th Cong., 1st sess.), a canal having 16 locks was recommended.

The canal, however, was insufficient, and in 1838, after $644,000 had been expended, boats still had to wait for a rise in order to get through. Recommendations were therefore made in 1838 for $750,000 more to extend the canal (H. Doc. No. 985, 25th Cong., 2d sess., June 27, 1838), but Congress declined to make the appropriation, not even providing for the maintenance of the inadequate locks, and the canal fell into ruin. Like many another inland waterway, it was never useful because it was never finished. For 38 years the Federal Government took little or no notice of this and many other inland waterway projects, but there came a revival of interest in this subject in the early seventies and in 1872 the United States engineers submitted a plan (H. Doc. No. 360, 62d Cong., 2d sess., p. 15) for the enlargement and repair of the old canal, at a cost of something over $4,000,000. The plan was modified in 1877, and the work was completed in 1890, at a total cost of $3,191,726. There are two sections, one with 9 locks along the north bank of the river around what is known as the Big Muscle Shoals. The other, a short distance farther upstream, has 2 locks and is located along the south bank of the river around the Elk River Shoals. Between these two portions of the canal, however, is what is known as Nances Reef, where the minimum depth is less than 2 feet, and which has never been provided for at all.

In 1891 a board of engineers submitted a project (Annual Report Chief of Engineers, 1891, p. 2314) for completing this work in an adequate way at an estimated cost of about $3,000,000. This project was never acted upon favorably by Congress. (H. Doc. 360, 62d Cong., 2d sess., p. 16.) Therefore, gentlemen, those who have abused and ridiculed the merits of the Muscle Shoals navigation project as an aid to transportation should remember this: There has never been built around Muscle Shoals a canal which could be considered complete according to standards proposed in 1838.

WATER POWER CONSIDERED.

By 1907 interest in water-power development had increased and in that year Congress ordered a survey of the Muscle Shoals section for the combined purposes of navigation and water-power development. Two years later, in 1909, Congress ordered the entire Tennessee River surveyed with a view to deciding upon a definite policy for permanent navigation development. This survey was completed in 1910. In 1911 Congress directed a special survey of the Muscle Shoals section for both navigation and power.

In 1913 the Alabama Power Co., through its subsidiary, the Muscle Shoals Hydroelectric Power Co., having made careful engineering studies of its own, offered to develop the Muscle Shoals section for water-power purposes, in cooperation with the Government. In 1914 the Army engineers completed their survey of the Muscle Shoals for navigation and water-power purposes, as ordered by Congress in 1911, and also considered the offer of the Muscle Shoals Hydroelectric Power Co., upon which they made a favorable report. Action on this was held up, however, pending further surveys and engineering investigations, borings, etc., which were made by the Government and required $150,000 and a year's time. These studies were completed in 1916, and again the Army engineers approved the offer of the Muscle Shoals Hydroelectric Power Co. in March, 1916.

NITRATES DISCUSSED.

At that time the House Committee on Military Affairs had under consideration the bill afterwards known as the national defense act. During the hearings Mr. Frank S. Washburn, who at that time had just resigned as president of the Alabama Power Co., appeared before the committee and eloquently demonstrated the necessity for a domestic supply of fixed nitrogen in this country as an essential part of any plan for adequate national defense. He argued that our supply of Chilean nitrates was being transported by water for 4,000 miles, that it could be cut off by a hostile fleet, and since nitrates are necessary in the production of all forms of explosives, in such an event we would be helpless unless we could produce our own nitrates independently of any outside country.

Mr. Washburn gave us a very graphic description of the growing depletion of our soils and made clear the imperative necessity for higher grade fertilizers at a lower price. He made the point that since fixed nitrogen is one of the essential elements in mixed fertilizer it was fortunately true that the great nitrogen industry which should be established in the interests of national defense in time of war would be a great economic blessing to our farmers in times of peace. Mr. Washburn described Muscle Shoals as an ideal locality for such an enterprise, surrounded as it is with abundant supplies of high-grade limestone and coking coal suitable for the cyanamid process of nitrogen fixation, while within a short distance are the great phosphate fields of Tennessee providing economically the second element of plant food, phosphoric acid. While he argued that the proper way to develop this industry was to build two large dams in the Tennessee River which would have the combined effect of permanently improving the navigation by wiping out the shoals and at the same time developing a large amount of hydroelectric power, he contended that the establishment of this industry by private capital was too great for any private individual or corporation to undertake if they were obligated to build the dams at their own expense.

HALF-PRICE FERTILIZER PREDICTED IN 1916.

Mr. Washburn suggested, therefore, that the Government should construct the dams and lease the power to some private company, charging as a rental 3 per cent of the cost of the dam and hydroelectric plant. Mr. Washburn was the first one to testify with some definiteness as to the economic benefits to the farmer that might be reasonably expected to result from the establishment of a great fertilizer industry at Muscle Shoals. His statement to the committee on February 11, 1916, was:

> My expectation is that the development of the nitrogen industry in this country would cut the farmers' fertilizer bill in half. (House hearings before Military Committee on national defense act, February 11, 1916, p. 23.)

The significance of this statement was emphasized by Mr. Washburn in a paper on the nitrogen problem which he prepared for the Secretary of Agriculture that same year, in which he reviewed the statistics of fertilizer consumption for the year 1914, and found that there was expended for commercial fertilizers in the United States in that year not less than $177,000,000, of which $134,000,000 was for nitrogen and phosphoric acid, so that his statement of a saving of one-half meant a saving of $67,000,000. From that day to this experts have persistently declared that this can be done. A committee of scientific specialists, known as the nitrogen products committee of the British Empire, in May, 1919, after an exhaustive study of the subject reported:

> Combined nitrogen, as cyanamid or ammonium sulphate, can be obtained by synthetic processes at a cost at the factory which is less than one-half the market price of combined nitrogen from other sources, pre-war conditions being taken as a basis in each case. (Report of Nitrogen Products Committee of British Empire, May, 1919, p. 33.)

Even the opponents of air-fixed nitrogen admit that plants of this sort can cut the price of fertilizer in half, for the Koppers Co., of Pittsburgh, the leading concern in this country which produces nitrogen in the form of by-product ammonia resulting from the coking of coal, states in March, 1922:

> The cost of operating these (air-nitrogen fixation) plants is relatively low, so that even to-day sulphate of ammonia is being sold in Germany at half the price in the United States, based on the present rate of exchange. (Koppers Co. booklet, March, 1922, p. 8.)

Then, coming right down to the past few weeks, Dr. R. F. Bacon, formerly a director of the Mellon Institute of Industrial Research, testifying on behalf of the offer of the associated power companies for Muscle Shoals, said, regarding the production of fertilizer by improved methods at Muscle Shoals:

We can deliver it to him (the farmer) on the farm for half or less than half of what he is paying now for mixed (fertilizer). (House Hearings, 1924, p. 133.)

Mr. E. M. Allen, president of the National Alkali Works, of Niagara Falls, Saltville, Va., and New York, who also testified on behalf of the power companies' offer, said, regarding the production of fertilizer at Muscle Shoals:

I feel positive that with the fertilizer that can be manufactured through this and combined processes starting from this ammonia that you virtually cut the cost to the farmer for fertilizer about in half. There is no doubt about it. (House Hearings, 1924, p. 126.)

So it seems well established that half-price fertilizer is being produced by these modern processes in Germany and that it is entirely possible to accomplish this same result at Muscle Shoals.

SECTION 124 BECOMES A LAW.

Returning now to our hasty account of the events leading up to the present situation, we find that as a result of the testimony offered at the hearings in 1916 by Mr. Washburn and others there was incorporated into the national defense act section 124, on nitrate supply, which reads as follows:

An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes.

SEC. 124. Nitrate supply: The President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to make, or cause to be made, such investigation as in his judgment is necessary to determine the best, cheapest, and most available means for the production of nitrates and other products for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products by water power or any other power as in his judgment is the best and cheapest to use; and is also hereby authorized and empowered to designate for the exclusive use of the United States, if in his judgment such means is best and cheapest, such site or sites, upon any navigable or nonnavigable river or rivers or upon the public lands, as in his opinion will be necessary for carrying out the purpose of this act; and is further authorized to construct, maintain, and operate, at or on any site or sites so designated, dams, locks, improvements to navigation, power houses, and other plants and equipment or other means than water power as in his judgment is the best and cheapest, necessary, or convenient for the generation of electrical or other power and for the production of nitrates or other products needed for munitions of war and useful in the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products.

* * * * * * *

The sum of $20,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available until expended, to enable the President of the United States to carry out the purposes herein provided for.

This law undertakes to provide for the national defense by having the facilities at hand with which to produce nitrates in time of war for use in the manufacture of explosives and to furnish aid to the farmers in peace times by utilizing the plant so established for the production of fertilizer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for just a question at that point? Out of what fund did the money come to build the plant?

Mr. McKENZIE. Out of the appropriations made to the Ordnance Department.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; I wanted the distinction to be made that that was not a part of the amount carried in the $20,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. McKENZIE. It came out of the appropriations made for ordnance.

ALABAMA POWER CO. OFFER HELD UP.

In June, 1916, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors reported that since the national defense act providing for the establishment of a Government nitrate plant had become a law they therefore recommended that action on the proposed contract with the Muscle Shoals Hydro-Electric Co. be suspended till it could be determined whether this site would be chosen for the nitrate plant.

My colleagues, it must be clear to you that the water power developed for such a specific purpose can not be regarded as an ordinary water-power development, and to say that the proper way to solve the Muscle Shoals problem is to maintain the nitrate plant in idle stand-by condition and to distribute the power as an ordinary public utility for the operation of street cars, or electric lights, or what not, is clearly and undeniably contrary to the purpose which Congress had in mind when this great enterprise was authorized.

There are a few in this House who favor the Government ownership and operation of private industry. Let those who favor this course mark well the record of what followed the passage of the national defense act. It was well known that there was but one commercially successful method for the fixation of nitrogen in 1916, and that that method was the cyanamid process; but although we were on the very verge of entering the great World War and notwithstanding the fact that the Chief of Ordnance had warned us of the folly of depending upon Chile for our nitrates, no one would have surmised that such a necessity existed to judge by the Government's leisurely course following the passage of this act.

PRICELESS MONTHS LOST.

In the spring of 1916 President Wilson appointed a committee of chemical experts, including officers of the Army and Navy and civilians, known as the nitric acid committee, with instruction to report on the best method of manufacturing nitrates. This committee reported on January 27, 1917, recommending the immediate development of water power for the manufacture of nitrates. Nothing was done to carry out the committee's recommendations.

On March 16, 1917, hearings were begun before an interdepartmental board, composed of the Secretaries of War, Agriculture, and Interior, to determine the location of the Government nitrate plants. On April 6, 1917, the United States declared war, and on May 11 a second committee, known as the President's nitrate supply committee, reported in favor of using the Haber process for making nitrates, and recommended that the plants be located in southwestern Virginia and that $3,000,000 be spent in an experimental program.

NITRATE PLANTS FINALLY STARTED.

On September 24, 1917, President Wilson, upon the request of farm organizations, eliminated Pulaski, Va., where a site had been recommended by the nitrate supply committee, and located nitrate plant No. 1 at Muscle Shoals.

Meanwhile, the situation that had been predicted by the advocates of the air-fixation nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals had arisen. The need for high-explosive ammonium nitrate was urgent but no adequate supply of the necessary fixed nitrogen existed or could be created in a domestic industry except by the cyanamid process. These facts were well known when the national defense act was passed June 3, 1916, but it was December 4, 1917, before the contract was signed for the construction of a nitrate plant using the only known available process, and in order that the plant might be useful in time of peace it was located at Muscle Shoals

NEED FOR GORGAS PLANT.

There are a number of sound business and engineering reasons why a steam power plant is necessary in connection with the hydroelectric plant at Muscle Shoals. Such a plant is necessary to supplement the hydroelectric power in seasons of low water for the economical operation of the enterprise. It was necessary to have a source of power for construction purposes and from this angle it was imperative that the power should be had promptly. From the standpoint of both time and economy the best arrangement appeared to be the installation of a 40,000-horsepower plant to be located at the power house of the Alabama Power Co., which was then constructing a 27,000-horsepower generating plant of its own 88 miles from Muscle Shoals, in the heart of the Alabama coal fields, on the Warrior River, where both coal and water for steam purposes were economically available. Accordingly arrangements were made for the installation and the work was completed early in October, 1918, at a cost of $4,979,782.

It was brought out in the hearings, however, that there were certain peculiar features about this arrangement. The Government's property was located on the lands of the Alabama Power Co., and the committee determined to investigate the situation on the ground. Following the trip to Alabama members reported that it was beyond question that the Alabama Power Co. had lost no opportunity of combining the Government's property with their own in such an intimate way as to make a separation impracticable if not impossible. So that while in the contract it was recognized and provided that the entire amount of power from the Government's Gorgas unit should be made available to whoever might purchase either of the nitrate plants from the Government, the contract was so drawn that the power company would have the sole right to purchase the Government's property at Gorgas, and anyone who might purchase the nitrate plants might lose all of his rights to receive electric power merely by a delay of 45 days in the payment of any monthly bill for electric power. He was also obliged to guarantee a minimum monthly payment to the Alabama Power Co. of $30,000 whether he took any power or not, and other severe terms were imposed. (House Hearings, 1922, pp. 160–162.) It was evident, therefore, that while the power company realized and admitted the necessity of the Gorgas plant as a source of power for the nitrate plants, even at some future time when hydroelectric power from the dams might be available, nevertheless the company sought to impose extremely severe terms upon anyone who might have the courage to try to operate the nitrate plants.

CONTRACT WITH ALABAMA POWER CO. CRITICIZED.

Members of the committee were justly indignant, my colleagues, when they realized the meaning of the cleverly-worded terms of one of the most intricate contracts that it has ever been my fortune to read. The power company undertook to compel the Government to sell its property to them as the sole purchaser on demand, while they, on their part, assumed no obligation to buy. In his opinion of May 23, 1922, the Attorney General declared:

No one can carefully analyze the long and rather complex contract made with this company without being impressed with the harsh and even drastic provisions which it imposes on the Government. When its intricate provisions are closely scrutinized and their full significance realized, it becomes at once apparent that the company lost no opportunity of turning to its own advantage every possible change of circumstances. (H. Rept. No. 1084, 67th Cong., 2d sess., p. 29.)

He goes on to say that the option of the Alabama Power Co. to purchase the Government's property at Gorgas was an effort to force the Government to sell without compelling the Alabama Power Co. to buy, and "in my opinion is invalid."

The Acting Judge Advocate General is quoted in the opinion that—the Secretary of War or contract officer representing the United States was without authority to enter into a contract for the sale of said property or for granting an option for the purchase.

And that therefore—this provision is nugatory and void and is not binding upon the United States. (House hearings, 1922, p. 24.)

In an opinion rendered August 4, 1923, in response to a request of the Secretary of War as to whether it was the duty of the United States to remove its property from the lands of the Alabama Power Co. if it should not determine to sell to them, the Acting Attorney General, Mr. A. T. Seymour, replied that—

The United States has the power to condemn for public purposes the lands of the company, including those upon which the Government structures have been placed. This is a sovereign attribute which no officer of the Government can waive or impair by contract or otherwise. * * * A finding by you that the acquisition of such lands is necessary in order to protect the Government's interests is all that is needed to the maintenance of a condemnation suit.

The Acting Attorney General, therefore, concluded that the Secretary of War was "free to initiate proceedings notwithstanding the contract."

It can not, therefore, be contended by the Secretary of War that he was under any legal obligation to sell the Gorgas plant to the Alabama Power Co. As for moral obligation, the Acting Attorney General, Mr. Seymour, stated that while—

The options to buy at cost or at an arbitrated value may have been among the considerations moving the company to enter into the contract, but when the time came it refrained from any attempt to proceed thereunder, and these options in fact have been eliminated by the omission of the parties to act under them, as well as by the fact that they have been found invalid.

THE PRICE OF OUR DELAY.

Returning again to the situation at Muscle Shoals we find that after the loss of a year and a half with the country engaged in war we were finally building a plant in desperate haste to produce the necessary nitrates so that this country could make its own explosives. The predictions of the advocates of the development of Muscle Shoals for the production of nitrogen for war purposes had again been strongly fulfilled. Just when it seemed that the outcome of the war was chiefly dependent upon our ability to secure sufficient ships to transport our Army, at a time when by taking over Dutch steamers and chartering Scandinavian and Japanese tonnage we had built up a transport fleet of 616 ships comprising some 3,562,000 tons (report of Chief of Transportation Service, War Dept. Ann. Rept., 1919, vol. 1, pt. 4, p. 4872), we were compelled to divert 128 of these vessels aggregating 700,000 tons, or 20 per cent of our entire transporting capacity, for the purpose of creating a nitrate fleet to bring this one essential material over the 4,000-mile route from Chile. (Report of Fixation and Utilization of Nitrogen, Nitrate Div., Ord. Office, War Dept., 1922, p. 23.) Ignoring all thought of the economic advantage of an adequate modern domestic nitrogen industry, suppose that we had had such an industry available during the war and those 128 vessels could have been used in the transportation of troops and supplies, who will deny the advantage from a military standpoint that would have been ours? We have had our lesson. What it has cost us no one knows, but to ignore it in our future plans would be inexcusable folly.

Although we were at war, the peace-time value of the nitrate plant was not lost sight of, and, realizing that nitrate for fertilizer purposes could not be economically produced by means of steam power, the President on February 25, 1918, authorized the construction of Dam No. 2, setting aside for this purpose some $12,000,000 of the $20,000,000 appropriated by section 124 of the national defense act. During 1918 nitrate plant No. 2 was completed and in November, 1918, came the armistice.

In January, 1919, Dr. A. G. Glasgow was appointed Nitrate Director by the President and directed to arrange for the operation of the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant for the manufacture of fertilizers.

PRIVATE CAPITAL DECLINES TO ASSIST AT MUSCLE SHOALS.
